According to the Seikyō Shimpō, the Greek Church in Japan is collecting materials for a Japanese Ecclesiastical History to be published at the close of the Nineteenth Century. Mr. Ishikawa Kisaburō is superintending the work and already has a great deal of matter in hand. In an article published in the Seikyō Shimpō Mr. Ishikawa gives his ideas as to the principles that should guide the compiler of such a book. He says that some Japanese seem to think that the object of an ecclesiastical history is to sing the praises of individuals who have helped to increase the number of converts. But this is not his idea of what is required of a Church historian. The author has to remember that the work about which he is writing is God's work and that the record of the expansion of the Church must be so compiled as to show God's hand in it all. "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy name give glory" must be the keynote of the history. The fortunes of the Church as a Church must be faithfully recorded, and to personal history as such a very subordinate place should be assigned. Some of the Christians who have been asked to furnish material for the contemplated work seem to think that it is their duty to magnify the importance of their own little corner of the Christian world. This is also a misconception, says Mr. Ishikawa. The chief thing to be noted with care is the life of a Church and all that nourishes and develops that life. What we need are signs that God is working in our midst. It is, of course, likely that in describing God's work events will be attributed to miraculous agency that had natural causes, but this is not a bad fault. It is better to believe in too many miracles than to believe in none at all. Where it is thought that the hand of God has been present, it is desirable that the most minute details of the incidents referred to should be given.

The Fukuin Shimpō makes some very important statements bearing on the relation of foreign missionaries to native pastors and other workers, which, if correct, indicate the adoption of an entirely new policy by the Protestant missionaries labouring in this country. No. 176 of the Fukuin Shimpō asserts that in several of the principal sects it has been decided that the foreign and native agents shall work apart and be entirely independent of each other. The sects specially mentioned are the Kumai Kyōkai, the Nihon-Kirisuto-Kyōkai and the Methodist Churches. Of the Methodists, the Fukuin Shimpō says that, though hitherto the Methodist Church in Japan has been called a Japanese Church, in future both in name and reality the Church will be a Canadian Methodist Church, as the Canadian Missionaries are controlling its affairs. The Fukuin Shimpō thinks that the relation of native Christians to foreign missionaries is one of the questions of the day and is of opinion that anything would be better than the weak manner in which so many Christians rely on foreign help. The relation of some churches to the foreign missionaries very much resembles that of a colony to the home country, says the Fukuin Shimpō.

We are not in possession of any special information on the subject, but we think that there is no doubt that one effect of the Dōshisha affair has been to make the missionaries very careful as to the amount of control over funds supplied by their Boards or Societies exercised by the Japanese. This seems natural enough, but whether they have gone to the length described by the Fukuin Shimpō we are unable to say.

The Fukuin Shimpō (No. 173) complains of the inaccuracy of the statistics lately published by "foreign missionaries" as regards the Nihon-Kirisuto-Kyōkai. We presume that it is to the "History of Protestant Missions in Japan" that the Fukuin Shimpō refers. The figures given there, as quoted by the Fukuin Shimpō, are 80 ordained pastors, 122 unordained pastors, 91 Bible women, 93 schoolmasters, 203 school-mistresses, making a total of 489. These figures are incorrect and misleading, says the organ we are citing. It does not explain, however, in what respects. Another grievance against the "History of Protestant Missions" is the use by the writers of that work of the word "native," which the Fukuin Shimpō tells us is "offensive to Japanese ears." According to this authority the term implies contempt.

If the Fukuin Shimpō occasionally says some rather severe things about foreigners and their ways, it cannot be affirmed that it is less severe on what it conceives to be the weaknesses and defects of the fellow-countrymen of the editor. No. 174 contains an article on the trimming and servility which characterise so many newspaper writers and politicians to-day. In pandering to the tastes of customers these men resemble the dancing girl and the restaurant-keeper, says the Fukuin Shimpō. There are no depths of sycophancy to which they will not descend in order to curry favour with the rich or the influential. Hypocrisy and pretence are to be seen on every hand; from the obscure student, whose home is some low-class smoky lodging-house, but who struts through the street with a cigarette in his mouth and a highly polished cane in his hand or appears on the platform uttering grandiloquent sentences on Japan's foreign policy, to the school-teacher who, while in his heart he welcomes the growth of democracy, for the sake of outward appearances and in order to please his employers keeps reading in public the Imperial Rescript on Education, bowing before the Emperor's picture and talking of "duties to the Crown and the State." Even the Church does not escape the taint of the prevailing insincerity, and there are pastors to be found who are pronounced trimmers.

Some weeks ago Mr. Uchimura Kanzō delivered an address to the Kanda Young Men's Society on "The advantages of Studying Theology," a report of which has been published in the Fukuin Shimpō. The following is the gist of Mr. Uchimura's remarks. I am not a theologian, but simply one who believes in theology as a benefactor of mankind. Theology is a subject that is specially taught at Divinity Schools. My knowledge of it is not that of an expert. Our object here is not to train men for becoming evangelists, but to bear testimony to the efficacy of Christianity as we know and believe it. There is a great difference between the study of theology in Europe and America and that carried on here. The Ministry in those countries is regarded as a high class profession which gives to those who follow it social rank that in many cases would not otherwise be possessed by them. In addition to this the pastors are paid regular stipends. In Japan a minister of Christ reaps no material benefits from his position. Socially he is not advanced, and as for money, he could make much more by following other callings. But he obtains mental advantages from the study of theology that are not to be had by any other means. History records numerous instances of the power of theology to work great changes in states. It was theology that in the sixteenth century delivered Holland from the thraldom of Spain's yoke. It was theology that in England fired the souls of Cromwell's troops and rendered them victorious over their foes. It was theology that prompted the Pilgrim Fathers to cross the Atlantic and led to their founding the great American state. Christian theology is suited to all countries alike. From Palestine, the centre of the world, it was intended that it should spread to every part of the globe. We are informed by naturalists that the fish which swim in the lake of Galilee represent all the different types found in other parts of the world. This gives a new meaning to Christ's words to his disciples "I will make you to become fishers of men." It was intended that all the different types of mankind should be gathered into the fold of Christ."

Several magazines still continue to comment on the Sugamo prison affair. The former Governor of the prison, Mr. Arima, has been made Governor of the Ichigaya prison. But great dissatisfaction is felt with the way that the Home Minister settled the affair. Neither the Christians nor the Buddhists are pleased. The former, through their organs, demand fair play and no favouritism. The Buddhists for the most part object to any concessions being made to Christianity, and, as for equality of treatment, they would regard this as quite heinous. The Kirisutokyō Shimbun attacks Count Itagaki. It says that the removal of Mr. Arima from Sugamo was done to appease the Buddhists. It thinks it hopeless to expect prison reform to be carried out by a statesman who has not the courage of his opinions. The Taiyō disapproves altogether of the way the whole thing has been managed. It represents the action of the Home Office as a patch-work business. Attempts were made to bridge over the difficulty of the situation temporarily. It thinks that all religions practiced in Japan should be publicly recognised and that the failure of the Government to take any steps towards the public recognition of Christianity has given the Buddhists an unfair advantage over their opponents in this controversy. The whole attitude of the Home Office towards Buddhism during the past few months has been of a nature to create distrust in the minds of discerning persons, says the Taiyō. It looks very much as though the Buddhists had succeeded in overawing the Government. The action of the Home Office in regard to the Hongwanji troubles is anything but praiseworthy, concludes the Taiyō.

merely a man?" "Our Immortality. Death and after death:" "The Motive power required for the revival of morality:" "Workmen and the Factory Laws." "Travels in Korea;" "Prison Reform;" &c.

The article on the future of Christianity in Europe and America is by the Rev. H. Kosaki. The first part of the article gives the history of a Mr. Yamazaki Tamenori, who, after graduating at the Imperial University went to the Dōshisha and graduated there in 1879. He at once became one of the teachers of the school; but died two years after. Mr. Kosaki relates that Dr. Hamao tried hard to persuade Mr. Yamazaki not to join the Dōshisha. Dr. Hamao said that religion was only fit for people of little education and undeveloped minds and that the spread of Christianity would interfere with the progress of civilisation in Japan. Mr. Kosaki then proceeds to relate how persistent and vigorous was the opposition to Christianity offered by Professor Morse. Professor Yatabe, too, undertook to show that the doctrine of the trinity was a mathematical impossibility. Three could not be one, nor one three. Mr. Kosaki is of opinion that the idea that Christianity hinders the progress of civilisation is no longer entertained by the educated classes. But they habitually represent Christianity as being on the wane in Europe and America. This Mr. Kosaki endeavours to show is not the case. He quotes instances of the hold that religion still has on the minds of men, and comes to the conclusion that its prospects are bright in the western world and thinks that those Japanese who, after spending many years abroad and mixing with all classes of society, have reached an opposite conclusion are entirely mistaken.

The Jisen Mondai (On Charity) is a much needed little book from the pen of Mr. Tomeoka Kōsuke published by the Keiseisha, Uneme-chō, Kyōbashi, Tōkyō, which sells at 25 sen a copy. It deals with the whole subject of charity in a very thorough manner, discussing its principal functions, its various kinds and qualities, the knowledge required by those who are desirous of exercising this virtue, the different methods of bestowing charity, the obligations and duties of Government, the upper class, and the wealthy in respect thereto. The various kinds of charitable institutions such as Reformatories, Asylums, and Industrial Homes are also discussed. Mr. Tomeoka, in addition to having had a great deal of practical experience in dealing with the fallen and the unfortunate in Japan, has made a special study of organised charity in Europe and America and gives the Japanese world the results of his investigations in this little volume. He points out how imperfect and bungling have been many of the charitable efforts of the Japanese in the past, owing to an entire ignorance of the best methods to pursue. He insists on the necessity of religion and science going hand in hand in the exercise of the virtue of charity, drawing attention to the harm that is caused by unskilful attempts to help the poor or the afflicted. It cannot be said that the development of charity in Japan has hitherto kept pace with other things. Hence a work like the Jisen Mondai was very much called for.

The Seikyō Shimpō (No. 430) has some very timely remarks on the violation of the principle of religious liberty by Japanese society at the present time. The Constitution is new, and few are the people who really understand its significance. New regulations arrayed against habitual modes of thought and ancient customs do not stand much chance of making their influence felt in a short space of time. The article in the Constitution which grants religious liberty to all Japanese subjects is to the majority a dead letter. Moreover, not a few people regard Christianity as an affront to the Throne, as containing elements that promote disloyalty, and hence they are prepared to defy the Constitution when opposing the foreign creed. Many of the teachers in Elementary Schools are guilty of acting in direct opposition to the Constitution. Without ever studying Christianity they undertake to inform their pupils that it would be a breach of loyalty on their (the pupils') part to adopt it. The same notion prevails in official circles. Municipal and police officers and men serving in various bureaux are distinctly under the impression that to adopt Christianity would be to lay themselves open to suspicion of disloyalty. In the case of the Elementary School teachers the mischief begins at the Normal Schools where they are trained. They go forth from those institutions with all kinds of silly prejudices in their minds. There is no attempt made by the conductors of these schools to enlighten the minds of the students on the subject of religious liberty and what it implies. In official circles the known sentiments of superior officers greatly influence their subordinates, and few are the cases where men are sufficiently in earnest to ignore all consequences of their action and openly profess Christianity.

But, continues the Seikyō Shimpō, notwithstanding the unpopularity of their conduct, there are even among school teachers a few sincere Christians and among judges still more. One of the reasons of their being more Christians among judges than among other high-class officials given by the Seikyō Shimpō is the fact that these officers are appointed for life. The effect of custom on belief is, in Japan, very strong, specially so in small villages and districts, where the action of individuals when differing from that of the majority attracts attention and causes umbrage. In large towns there is much more liberty of practice and belief. The opposition of custom is something that the law cannot deal with, and yet it is a law in itself, which quietly undermines in many cases the written law of the land. This is the greatest of all the forces arrayed against Christianity, concludes the Seikyō Shimpō, but she is strong enough to overcome even this foe. It is by means of the strength of opposing forces that we get to know what is the power of the religion of Christ. It is not in calm seas that our vessel shows at her best, but when the waves are high and the wind boisterous.

Commenting on the attack on Christians which took place at Shirakawa in September last, already referred to in these columns, the Fukuin Shimpō says that in many instances that have come to its notice the same kind of thing has happened, where Christians have taken a stand against established customs. No Christian teacher or student will escape a certain amount of ridicule or persecution when he differentiates himself from his fellows and follows his own religious customs. But one of the duties of the Christian is to discuss the practices of his fellow-countrymen and if he deems them wrong to endeavour to rectify them. The subject of religious festivals and what goes on during their celebration is one on which Christians must pronounce an opinion. But when they take steps to make their views known, first comes coldness from their fellow-citizens or fellow-townsmen, and then, in some cases, open opposition. It is quite evident that the obligation to grant religious liberty to others is one which the majority do not feel. But as regards Christians, before all things they must so act as to secure peace of conscience. If they forego this for the sake of temporary peace and quiet, they will suffer in consequence sooner or later. It is far preferable that they should openly declare their belief, let the consequences be what they may.

It has been customary to represent Shintō as inferior to both Buddhism and Christianity, on account of original Shintō consisting of nothing but ancestral worship. The absence of an elaborate ceremonial and abstruse doctriness such as characterise Buddhism and many forms of Christianity is often cited as a proof that Shintō has no title to be called a religion. In a striking article published in the Nihon Shugi, a member of the pure Shintō school—of which Mr. (now Sir Ernest) Satow gives an account in Vol. III. of the Transactions of the Asiatic Society—glories in the dissimilarity to both Buddhism and Christianity that marks the original Shintō cult. The title of the article is "The Happiness of having no Religion." The writer commences by confessing that it is impossible to state in a few words exactly what Shintō teaches. It began when the nation came into existence and has so entwined itself with all the various phases of Japanese life as to be inseparable from them. Our agriculture and industry, our morality and our education may all be traced to this fountain-head. But there is something about our real Shintō that is quite different from both Christianity and Buddhism. Take our festivals. In them we worship the past. We call to mind the many benefits we have received from our ancestors and lift up our hearts in thanksgiving. But with all Buddhist and Christian festivals the thoughts of devotees are centred on the present benefits to be derived from their devotion, or the future rewards that they will receive in consequence of the homage they are paying to their objects of worship. In original Shintō there was no system of doctrines, no elaborate ceremony. The remembrance of a noble ancestry was kept fresh in the minds of the people and they were expected to strive to live lives worthy of their forefathers. In subsequent times Shintō shared the fate of most creeds. It was corrupted. It was provided with a ceremonial and with a system of doctrines. After the introduction of Buddhism into Japan the influence of the two creeds on each other led to numerous modifications of the original character of both. In order to render itself acceptable to the Japanese people, Buddhism borrowed largely from Shintō and represented its objects of worship to be no other than Shintō gods under other names. Shintō, on the other hand, recog-dazzling and captivating in the gorgeous ceremonial and the minute and philosophic doctrines of the Buddhists, and she incorporated as much of the alien system as she could assimilate. But it is quite possible even to-day to distinguish in Shintō that which was original from that which was derived, the tree from that which was grafted on it.

It is quite true to say that the Japanese state has no religion; that the Japanese people need no religion. The people that need a religion are servile and without principle. (Nihon no Kokka, kokumin wa mushūkyō nari. Warera wa shūkyō wo yōsedsu. Shūkyō wo yōsuru kokumin wa hikutsu nari mushugi nari). The chief object of religion, according to many, is to give those who believe in it peace of mind throughout life. But those who act on principle, those whose minds are strong already, possess this peace without seeking it elsewhere. It is only those who have no principles to guide them that are always looking to others for help. It is this unrest of mind on the part of many that necessitates the proclamation of pessimistic doctrines. The world is blamed because it does not yield what can only come from the mind's stability and assurance alone. Those whose principle are fixed know no disquietude and no disappointment.

Religion is one of the greatest causes of unrest and dissatisfaction that the world contains. The religious devotee is unable to enjoy to the full the pleasures of life, because he is alway hankering after the happiness of the life to come. Then the great religious systems are all permeated with egoism. Even charity, when performed, as is so frequently the case, for the sake of the future reward that it is expected it will secure, becomes spurious. It becomes a barter. It will gives so much now, in order to receive more hereafter. I am one of those who has never known what it is to be led astray by religion. It is my happiness to belong to a people whose hearts are happy because they are well established, fortified by principle. We can enjoy the present and feel no necessity to ask about the future. We rejoice in our country's progress and thank our stars that we are the descendants of such noble ancestors. So concludes the author of the Mushūkyō no Kōfuku.

The same number of the Nihon Shugi from which we have quoted refers to the movement in England against teaching religion in State Schools by the members of what is called "The Moral Instruction League." It is contended by this party that the mixture of religious and moral teaching in schools is attended with great harm. Most religious doctrines are founded on supernaturalism; which is rejected by millions of young men in Europe, and the danger is that the destruction of the citadel of religious belief will involve the fall of the fortress of morality. In order to avoid this, the members of the Association mentioned above are proposing what they deem a thoroughly reliable basis of ethics—a basis as old as the world and capable of being used in any part of the globe. In England, says the Nihon Shugi, there is a good deal of bigotry and narrow-mindedness to contend with. It is only in France and Switzerland that moral teaching in public schools is free from all religious elements. It is difficult for Japanese to realise how powerful is tradition and custom in England in the matter of religion. It seems pitiable, continues the organ we are quoting, that at the end of the nineteenth century, notwithstanding all the advance that science has made and the large number of scientific men that England contains, it should be necessary to form a league in order to effect a reform that to us Japanese appears so natural that it needs no recommending. We are not troubled in this way here. In keeping religion out of our schools there is no religious prejudice or superstition to overcome. It is true, though, that a few ignorant people have of late advocated the introduction of religious teaching into our schools. It would be difficult to match the density of such people, concludes the Nihon Shugi.

The Yorozu Chōhō states that there is a dispute going on between the Home Department and the Hōsei Kyoku (Legislative Bureau, connected with the Cabinet) in reference to the status to be given to the Ise Imperial Shrines and to those shrines known as Kwampei-taisha, where the ceremonies performed are under the direct supervision of the Government In the Bill to be presented to the Diet at its next session entitled Shaji-hōan, something definite will have to be inserted on this subject. The question which has to be settled is, shall the Ise Shrine alone occupy a different rank from ordinary places of worship? or shall the Kwampei-taisha also be excluded from the list of ordinary shrines to be controlled by the bureau which will take charge of all temples and churches?

Mr. Anezaki has translated Hartman's "Philosophy of Religion." In a review of the work, the Rikugō Zasshi says that in point of style the translation is not equal to Mr. Anezaki's "History of Religion in India." In that work the language flows along in an easy manner, but in the translation now published Mr. Anezaki seems "like a man climbing the sides of a mountain covered with thorns." Nevertheless the religious public is to be congratulated in having such a treatise as Hartman's Philosophie des Unbewussten rendered intelligible to them. There are many parts of Hartmann's work that are very applicable to Japan at the present time, says the Rikugō Zasshi. The transcendental basis of belief which he elaborates serves equally well for both Christianity and Buddhism. Although Mr. Anezaki has no doubt expended a good deal of labour on the translation, there are, says the Rikugō Zasshi, many parts of it that are very hard to understand. The subject itself is a stiff one and the reader must beware of becoming discouraged at the outset. Careful perusal of the whole volume, however, will well repay the earnest student.

The destructive storms of the 27th ultimo seem to have done most serious havoc in Echigo province. The railway between the Funtsuri Iron Bridge and Yoneyama 1st tunnel was greatly damaged, and the sleepers were all washed away by the flood. The damage is estimated at over yen 10 000. The engineers of the Railway Company are engaged on repairs, but traffic will be suspended for several days more.

THE IMPERIAL DIET.

SATURDAY, DEC. 3RD.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

The weather on the 3rd instant proved so inclement that His Majesty's resolve not to ignore the injunctions of the Court physicians by opening the Diet in person, proved very fortunate. The Prime Minister read the Imperial Speech, which ran as follows:—

We hereby declare the Imperial Diet open for business.

Lords and Gentlemen—Our relations with the various Treaty Powers continue to be of an increasingly amicable character.

The time for the operation of the Revised Treaties is now close at hand, We trust that all classes of Our people will endeavour to bring the event to a successful issue.

For the purpose of placing the finances on a sound footing, We have directed Our Ministers of State to devise the necessary expedients, and to submit for the consideration of the Diet projects of law for the consummation of that purpose, together with the Budget for the 32nd fiscal year, and various other measures. We trust that you, Lords and Gentlemen, will impartially and circumspectly discharge your functions of deliberation and consent with regard to these important affairs of state.

MONDAY, DEC. 5TH.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEES, ETC.

On the 5th instant both Houses of the Diet met, but the only business transacted was the election of the Standing Committees and of the Chairmen of Committee of the Whole. To the latter office Prince Tokugawa Iyesato was elected in the House of Peers and Mr. Haseba Junko in the House of Representatives. Mr. Haseba is a member of the Liberal Party, or, perhaps we should say, of the Constitutional Party, since he owes his election to the united support of the sections forming the latter, not to the votes of the Liberals alone. It follows, therefore, that the three principal posts in the Houses—those of President, Vice-President and Chairman of Committee of the Whole—are occupied by members of the Constitutional Party. Hitherto there has been a certain amount of give and take in this matter. If one party's candidate was elected to the Presidency, another's was chosen Vice-President, and yet another's had the honour of becoming Chairman of the Whole. But the Constitutionalists are now supreme, and they have apparently resolved that their supremacy shall not be challenged. Of course the position of Chairman of the Whole is not a prize, so far as emoluments are concerned. The President receives an annual salary of four thousand yen and the Vice-President a salary of two thousand—not by any means insignificant rewards, seeing the work to be done for them is limited to a period of three months in the year. But the Chairman of Committee of the Whole is not a paid official, and his privilege is limited to taking the place of the President whenever the House goes into committee to debate on the third reading of a bill. Still the position has always been coveted for the sake of the distinction it confers, and the election of a Liberal furnishes additional proof that the Constitutional Party has a strong majority, for although the main body of the Independents may be expected to vote with the Government's supporters on all questions of a legislative character, they would not recognise any such obligation in the matter of electing the Chairman of the Whole, and the victory of the Liberals in the latter case is correspondingly suggestive. Prince Tokugawa Iyesato is the representative of the great family of Tokugawa, the last of the Shoguns, Tokugawa Keiki, having become Inkyo.

TUESDAY, DEC. 6TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

A GIFT TO THE THRONE.

The House of Peers met at 10.10 a.m., and after the reading of various reports and the granting of some applications for leave of absence, Marquis Kuroda moved that the Order of the Day be changed for the purpose of proceeding at once to consider a Representation urging the Government to transfer to the Crown Property a sum of 20 million yen from the portion of the Indemnity now remaining in the Treasury. The House agreed, and the Representation, having been read, was adopted unanimously. It ran as follows:—

Whereas during the War of the 27th and 28th years of Meiji, His Imperial Majesty, our illustrious Sovereign, this Empire's Great Civil and Military Ruler, advanced the Imperial Standard to Hiroshima, and in his Imperial person directed the affairs of the War so that abroad the soldiers of the country offered up their lives for the public cause, and, at home, a united people, one and all animated by a warlike spirit, offered up their resources for the conduct of belligerent operations, with the result that peace was finally restored to the East and the glory of the country made to shine throughout the world; and whereas we, His Majesty's subjects, are profoundly sensible that these issues were mainly due to the Imperial virtues, we desire to express the sincerity of our respectful gratitude by including in the Imperial Estates, as a memento of the signal successes achieved in the War, a sum of twenty million yen from the Indemnity obtained in consequence of the country's victories.

NEW BILLS.

The House then proceeded with the Order of the Day, and handed the following bills to Special Committees:—

1. Government Bill embodying a Law for the Better Preservation of Military Secrets.

The explanation of reasons appended to this measure states that, as the country's defences are now approaching completion, some regulations are necessary to prevent the divulging of military secrets or the publishing or sale of secret military books, documents, and plans. The project contains several clauses, defining the nature of the offences referred to, and prescribing penalties.

2. A Government Bill embodying Amendments of Law for Grants in Aid of the Families of Deceased Officials.

3. A Government Bill for extending the System of Military Courts Martial to the Troops Serving in Formosa.

With regard to this bill it was explained that the Military Law now in operation creates competence for holding courts-martial in Districts falling within the limits assigned to the various Army Division. The Island of Formosa is not among those Districts, and special legislation is therefore necessary in its case.

4. A Government Bill for amending the Boundaries between Chiba and Ibaraki Prefectures.

The House rose at 10.45 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.10 p.m., and after the usual preliminary business, proceeded to the Order of the Day, handing the following bills without discussion to special committees:—

1. Government Bill for the Protection of the Aborigines in Hokkaido.

It was explained with reference to this Bill that the aboriginal inhabitants of Hokkaido were entitled to the same measure of consideration and public assistance as that enjoyed by all the other subjects of Japan, and that, owing to the absence of aid, they were gradually disappearing in the struggle for the survival of the fittest. It was therefore proposed that a grant of 15,000 tsubo of land should be made [illegible] engaging in agriculture, conditionally on the land's being neither pawned nor sold; that farming implements and seed should be given gratis to those unable to purchase them; that no tax should be levied on such lands for a term of 30 years; that medical aid and medicines should be provided for the sick, and burial for the dead, if necessary, and that schools should be established. The Law is framed to go into operation from January 1st, 1899.

2. A Government Bill for excluding Kobe from the places where silk-conditioning warehouses are established. The amendment to go into operation from date of promulgation.

3. A Private Bill for amending the Registration Law.

A Representation was then introduced by Mr. Haseba Junko, urging that a sum of 20 million yen from the remainder of the Indemnity be included in the Imperial Estates. Mr. Haseba confined himself to reading the Representation and the brief appended statement of reasons. One of the members suggested that as the measure advocated in the Representation was understood to have been planned by the former Cabinet and handed down to the present Ministry, it might be embodied in a Government Bill with greater propriety than in a Representation made by the House. Mr. Haseba treated this suggestion with contempt, and, no member being found to second the proposal, the Representation was at once put to the vote and adopted unanimously.

The House rose at 1.45 p.m.

THURSDAY, DEC. 8TH.

The House of Peers did not meet.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SPEECH BY THE MINISTER PRESIDENT.

The House of Representatives met at 1.10 p.m., and after the usual reports had been made, the Prime Minister ascended the rostrum and read the following address:—

GENTLEMEN,—Having been honoured for a second time with the Sovereign's mandate to conduct the Administration, I am pleased to have this opportunity of submitting to you a statement of my policy. I need scarcely remind you of the fact that the change of Cabinets took place on the eve of the assembly of the Diet, and that, consequently, we have not had time to give full attention to all the important State affairs calling for legislation. With regard, however, to works connected with the programme of defensive armament and the development of the national resources, mapped out and undertaken as part of the post bellum scheme, inasmuch as their general object and scope were decided from the first and endorsed by successive Cabinets, we deem it sufficient to follow the routine indicated by our predecessors. But in the case of such works, not only was it found impossible to avoid some excess of expenditures over estimates, owing to the enhanced price of all commodities and to the vicissitudes of the era, but also certain additional correlated works presented themselves as inevitable. Steps had therefore to be taken to provide means for meeting the increased expenditures in one case and the added outlay in the other. Various measures for obtaining the requisite funds were therefore devised by the officials concerned, and the Diet was invited to consider them in its eleventh session. Owing, however, to the dissolution of the House of Representatives and to other causes, that purpose could not be accomplished, and it results that, to the great concern of all classes of the nation, there has been a failure to place the finances on a sound footing. I entertain no doubt that you, gentlemen, who approve of the purpose I have in view, will lend your assistance to correct the situation. In spite of the brief interval that has elapsed since the present Cabinet took office, we have adopted measures to secure financial stability, and submitted them to the Diet. The particulars of them will be explained to you by the Minister of State for Finance.

GENTLEMEN,—The relations between this empire and foreign nations have grown closer year by year. You will share the satisfaction I feel in being able to state that despite the numerous problems presenting themselves in the Far East, it has been possible for us to march in perfect harmony with foreign governments. Nevertheless, in these days of rapid progress, it becomes necessary, if we desire not to fall behind in the competitive race, that we should not relax our efforts for a moment in the domains of education, of production, of productive industries, of means of communication, and of trade. We have, in fact, carried the post bellum programme only half-way towards completion. It is our earnest hope that we may succeed in devising plans for strengthening the financial situation, winning the confidence of the country, and establishing prosperous economical conditions in general, so that the various works now in hand may be gradually brought to completion.

A very short time will now bring us to the consummation of the Treaty Revision which has been the constant desideratum of the nation for many years. The effect will be to greatly improve our international position; but at the same time, it becomes our duty to give full thought to the measures necessary in connexion with the operation of the new Treaties, so that by creating on both sides a feeling of equal security, and establishing our mutual intercourse on a footing of warm sympathy, the change may be productive of happy results. The Government has spared no pains in elaborating such administrative measures as may suffice to prevent mistakes, and we sincerely trust that you also, in conjunction with the people, will give the fullest attention to this matter.

The Government has taken steps to prepare, for submission to the Diet, whatever projects of law seem essential for giving administrative effect to the policy which I have here indicated. That you, gentlemen, by taking these questions into careful and impartial consideration, will enable the business of the State to be carried on smoothly and progressively, is the hope earnestly entertained by myself and my colleagues in the interests of the country.

THE FINANCIAL POSITION.

After the conclusion of the address, which was read with deliberation and emphasis, and listened to attentively, Count Matsukata, Minister of State for Finance, ascended the rostrum, and read the following:—

GENTLEMEN,—I am very glad to have the opportunity of saying a few words to you with reference to the Budget for the 32rd fiscal year, which is now in your hands. You are already aware that an unavoidable increase of expenditures, caused by the progress of the country, has to be faced. The Budget of outlays for the 32nd year had been compiled before I took office, and the present Government, considering it a suitable measure, decided to present it to you in that form. You well know, gentlemen, that our finances to-day present features which inspire much uneasiness. The expenditures for the approaching fiscal year aggregate 226,344,700 yen, and the revenue now in sight totals only 188,738,400 yen, so that there is a deficiency of income to the amount of 37,606,300 yen. It is therefore evident that steps must be taken to redress this inequality. The last Cabinet spared no effort to reduce the public outlays as far as possible, but many factors contributed to limit those efforts; namely, the marked appreciation of all commodities; the necessity of adopting various measures with reference to the operation of the Revised Treaties and the enforcement of the new Codes; the extension of means of communication; the inclusion of outlays on account of Formosan development and the encouragement of navigation in the Ordinary Expenditures, and the adoption of schemes for the defence of Hokkaido and Formosa. All these are pressing measures and indispensable. Some means must consequently be found of recruiting the revenue in order that it may be equal to meeting these various drafts upon it. With regard to increased taxation, the last Cabinet conducted various investigations, but did not arrive at any definite conclusion. Hence the present Government has been obliged to supplement those investigations, and the results are embodied in bills which will be submitted to you. No national problem presses more urgently and imperatively for solution at present than that of restoring the finances to a sound condition. To that end, some stable sources of increased revenue must be found. In the forefront of such sources the Government places an increase of the Land Tax and Sake Tax, and supplements these by amendments of the Income Tax and the Registration Tax. An additional revenue of 33,888,400 yen will thus be obtained in the 32nd fiscal year. That, however, does not represent the full increment expected from these sources, for in consequence of the collection periods being fixed in the cases of the Land Tax and the Saké Tax, the total income derived from a change in their rates can not be collected during the first year after the change. In the 33rd fiscal year, these increased taxes are estimated to yield a total additional revenue of 44,983,000 yen. In the meanwhile, it will be necessary next year to make a draft upon the Indemnity to the extent of 3,700,000 yen. By proceeding thus, not only will equilibrium be restored in the finances, but also they will be placed on a really sound basis. I would bespeak your appreciative consideration of these points above all others.

In addition to the above, certain matters of importance, as the supplementary expenses of the Iron Foundry, the cost of public works in Formosa, outlays on account of telegraph improvement, and so forth, have been handed over to me by the last Cabinet in an unsettled condition. They are now under examination, and we hope to be able to submit bills to you in a few days.

All particulars with regard to increased taxation will be given when each item comes up for your deliberation. But I have to point out that, among the measures for increased taxation, there are some which, if passed, will become operative from January next. It is therefore desirable that these should receive your early attention.

The increased expenditures are inevitable results of the state of affairs at home and abroad. At home you are confronted by the necessity of completing many administrative undertakings, and by a marked appreciation of commodities. Abroad, the conditions of the various Powers in the Far East have undergone large changes. I myself am convinced beyond all doubt that this empire of Great Japan has full strength to follow whatever course may be adapted to the conditions existing at home and abroad. But if the finances are not properly managed, if a policy of patchwork and temporizing be pursued with regard to them, I ask you how the empire's strength can be signally utilized. Most unfortunately for the interests of the country, the Government and the Diet have not been able to work in harmony since last year. If unhappily the bills for increased taxation fail now to pass, it is impossible to tell when we may hope to see our finances placed on a sound footing. Nay, the post-bellum undertakings will have to be suspended midway towards completion, the productive enterprises of the people will be paralysed, the country's credit will be impaired at home and abroad, and the nation's fortunes may suffer a serious reverse.

Gentlemen, if with sincerity of heart and mind, examining these problems, circumspectly and impartially, you approve the bills submitted to you by the Government, the bases of the country's finance will be consolidated and confidence will be restored in economical circles, so that we may confidently look forward to the revival of many industrial enterprises now in a languishing condition, to restored activity in the money market, and to the rapid growth of the mechanism of communications. I sincerely trust that you will take these steps for the sake of the future welfare of the country, for the development of its wealth and military strength, for the increase of its prestige, and for the happiness of its people.

The delivery of the above speech was not interrupted by any of the signs of impatience or hostility so common under similar circumstances on previous occasions. But after its conclusion, an attempt was made to revive the old system of frivolous cross-questioning. Mr. Kanaoka observed that during the two years which had elapsed since Count Matsukata last presented a Budget to the House, the State's expenditures had grown by 75 million yen. He wanted to know how that had come about. And he wanted to know whether financial stability would really be secured by an additional revenue of some 30 million yen. Would there not be need of another demand upon the people two or three years hence?

Count Matsukata replied that if the proposed bills were passed, he entertained no doubt as to the stability of the finances. Concerning the changes that the times might hereafter bring, he could not predict anything, not having divine foresight. Sympathising, however, with the natural anxiety of his questioner, he would add a word or two. The present method of financing was mere patchwork, and could not possibly be credited with any measure of stability. If financial credit did not exist at home, how could it possibly exist abroad? Nothing of the kind had ever been the case in Japan before. In pursuance of the post bellum programme, domestic bonds to the extent of 220 million yen had to be floated, but only 50 millions had been placed. The remainder of the loan could not be raised. If the Government went into the home market to-day, it could not obtain money. The obviously essential course was to increase the permanent revenue so as to restore the finances to a healthy condition.

Mr. Kudo Kokan and other members endeavoured to badger the Minister with reference to his disavowal of divine prescience, and to raise objections to any increase of the Land Tax which accentuated the present inequalities of incidence. Mr. Koyama wanted to know whether the Cabinet had any policy of its own. Judging from the Prime Minister's speech, the Ministry seemed to have simply adopted the policy of its predecessors. The House, however, showed itself impatient of this questioning, and the Ministers were presently suffered to withdraw quietly.

NEW BILLS.

The Order of the Day was then taken, and various Government Bills were handed, without many queries, to Special Committees. These measures were :—

1. A bill for amending the schedule of Income Tax Rates.

2. Bills for changing the Sake Tax, in the sense of raising to 12 yen per koku the tax upon refined sake (now 7 yen), unrefined sake (now 6 yen), white sake (now 7 yen), and sweet sake (now 7 yen); and to 13 yen per koku the tax on shochiu and alcohol (now 8 yen each), and on mixed sake (now 6 yen); also a bill for abolishing the brewing of sake for domestic use.

3. Bill for abolishing the present business tax on alcohol, and substituting an import tax on foreign alcohol and a brewer's tax on home-made alcohol.

4. Bill providing that in the case of alcohol used for medicinal or industrial purposes, the amount of tax originally paid shall be restored.

5. Bill providing for the imposition of the following ad valorem import duties on the articles enumerated :—

Alcohol	250	per	cent.
Cigars	100	,,	,,
Cigarettes	100	,,	,,
Snuff	100	,,	,,
Cut Tobacco	100	,,	,,
Various kinds of manufactured tobacco	100	,,	,,
Chinese distilled sake	100	,,	,,
Chinese non-distilled sake...	80	,,	,,
Chinese refined sake resembling Japanese	80	,,	,,
Other kinds of distilled sake	100	,,	,,
Other kinds of non-distilled sake	80	,,	,,

6. Bill for interdicting the import of foreign leaf tobacco, except by the Government, the latter to have a monopoly of the sale of any tobacco imported by it.

7. Bill for amending the Registration Tax Law.

8. Bill for abolishing the tax on ships in Okinawa Prefecture (Riukiu). N.B. The tax is an old institution. It is levied on all vessels with a spread of canvas measuring 5 tan or upwards, and the amount now collected is only 10 yen annually.

9. Bill for amending the Business Tax Law in the following sense :—

To the 2nd clause of Art. 15 of the Business Tax Law, No. 33, issued in 1896, the following :—

"When there are stores or other business premises at several places in Japan and abroad, if the capital is not differentiated, the portion of it that is employed at each store or other place of business in Japan shall be estimated, and the tax shall be imposed upon that portion."

The following article, making Art. 40, shall be added after Art. 39 :—

"Art. 40. The proviso contained in the explanatory clause added after clauses 2 of the 15th Article shall be applied in cases where there are several stores or other business premises in places where this law is operative and in places where it is not operative."

THE PHILIPPINES.

It will be very interesting to see how the United States Government deals with the difficult questions which must immediately present themselves now that America has become the owner of extra-Continental territories. The problem of the tariff is immediately prominent. It would be manifestly unreasonable to extend the operation of the United States' tariff to the Philippines. That fact needs no demonstration. But from the moment that the Philippines become an integral part of the Republic, the Government in Washington is constitutionally precluded from making any discrimination with regard to them. They must come under the general system applicable to the States in general. Will Congress be asked to take some special legislative action? Then there is the broad question of military operations. Saddled with the responsibility of governing these newly acquired territories in various quarters of the globe, must the Cabinet in Washington consult the views of the several States before organizing any military operations on a large scale? It is plain that the constitution is not sufficiently elastic to be extended to the contingencies now in sight.

THE NIPPON YUSEN KAISHA'S ALMANACKS.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's almanacks for 1899 are already published. There are two, each of the same size, and similar in general arrangement—a circular medallion in the centre, showing the Hitachi Maru under a full head of steam; a leaf almanack on the right, and a rectangular medallion below, containing a brief statement of the Company's services, its offices and agencies. Around the two medallions and the almanack floral scrolls are disposed, the flowers in one case being white cherries, chrysanthemums and wistaria; in the other, pink cherries and red, blue and mauve convolvulus. The cards are beautiful specimens of designing and chromo-lithographical technique. They appear to have been lithographed by different firms, for one bears the name of Mitsuma, Ginza, Sanchome, Tokyo, and the other, that of the Tokyo Printing Company. Certainly in this kind of work the Tokyo experts have not much to learn from any other country.

THE CRUISER "KASAGI."

It turns out that the telegram recently sent by Reuter with regard to the cruiser Kasagi was a great exaggeration. The telegram stated that the Kasagi had collided with a bridge, on her way up the river to Newcastle, and that she had suffered serious injury. Our readers may remember that no news of the event had been received at the Naval Department in Tokyo, and that the probability of some exaggeration on the part of Reuter's agent was consequently inferred. The facts, as now ascertained by the Naval Department, are that the vessel had been taken over by Armstrong's people, and that she was proceeding to their works to take on board her armament when she came into slight contact with a bridge. One of her sponson suffered a trifling injury which will be repaired without difficulty. These details were telegraphed to Tokyo by Mr. Matsunaga, who is now at Newcastle, inspecting the progress of the ships that are under construction to order of the Japanese Government.

JUDGE TAKANO AGAIN.

The Takano affair is not dead. It is to be brought up once more in the present session of the Diet. A Question has already been presented over the names of Messrs. Suzuki Shigeto, Abe Hanken and other well-known members of the Opposition. They put the matter in this form:—"The Matsukata Cabinet decided that the Second clause of the 58th Article of the Constitution, which guarantees a life tenure of office to Judges, does not extend to Formosa. Is the present Cabinet of the same opinion?" The present Cabinet will of course answer in the affirmative. The Constitution does not extend to Formosa. We do not believe that a single jurisconsult could be found to assert that it does. From some points of view the treatment extended to Mr. Takano may have been open to criticism, but that the Government was competent to remove him, is a proposition scarcely admitting of question.

"THE MAGISTRATE" AT THE PUBLIC HALL.

"The Magistrate" is one of the most ambitious pieces ever attempted by the amateur Thespians of Yokohama, as a glance at the caste given below will show—sixteen characters being engaged in its production—but they are justified in the event. Produced in March, 1885, at the Court Theatre, London, when that bijou play-house was under the management of the late John Clayton and Arthur Cecil, Pinero's whimsical farce has been revived again and again, until it would seem that Shakespeare's lines, borrowed and adapted for the occasion, may apply to it—

Age cannot wither, nor custom stale,
Its infinite variety.

Linked to witty dialogue are situations which compel spontaneous laughter; but the fun never degenerates into banality; Pinero is too resourceful a craftsman for that: and interest therefore never flags, nor does the intellectual palate revolt at the feast of quip and fancy spread for its delectation. The plot may be briefly summarized. Agatha Poskel marries, after she has crossed over to the shady side of thirty, a Mr. Poskel, the occasional occupant of the bench of Mulberry-street Police Court. It was her second venture into matrimony and perhaps it was pardonable that the handsome dame should be rather reticent in regard to her precise age. Indeed, she exercises the prerogative, wrongly supposed to belong to her sex, and misstates it, by putting back the clock of her life by fully five years. This has rather awkward consequences, for by her first marriage she has offspring, in the shape of a precocious lad, and if the mother's age has to suffer revision so has the son's. Thus we have the pleasing result of a lad of 19 masquerading as a hobble-de-hoy of 14; and full advantage does he take of the situation so obligingly prepared by his maternal parent. The young hopeful unfortunately gains complete ascendancy over his step-father and teaches that erst-while venerable and up-right man many reprehensible tricks, among them a game of cards which enables Cis to "rook" the Magistrate and his brother justice whenever he is in want of pocket money. The engaging youth, it appears, has a private room in the Hôtel des Princes, a house of dubious reputation, where he carries on the life of a spark about town. Just about the time when the farce opens, an old friend of Mrs. Poskel unexpectedly returns from India. This gentleman, Colonel Lukyn, was god-father to Cis; and the lady consequently fears that the truth about her age will leak out, for Mr. Poskel, meeting him casually in the City, asks the Colonel home to dinner. Mrs. Poskel on learning this is alarmed, and, despite the lateness of the hour, under excuse of visiting a sick friend, proceeds with her sister, Miss Charlotte Verrinder, to Lukyn's lodgings to beg of him not to discourse of dates in allusion to her, or her late lamented, or their offspring, while dining with, or talking to, the Magistrate. The ladies find the Colonel has gone to the Hôtel des Princes, where, in his salad days, he also kept a room. As luck will have it, Poskel, that same evening, has been induced by his incorrigible stepson to go "out on the spree" and they are supping at the same hotel when Mrs. Poskel arrives to interview the Colonel; though the good lady fondly believes that both her darlings are safe in bed at home. The hands of the clock have by this time flown past the regulation closing hour for hotels in London, and of course a raid is made on the house by the police. They could not have chosen a more inopportune moment for all concerned. Cis and the Magistrate manage to escape by falling through the kitchen skylight and bolting by a back entry, but the others are caught and at Mulberry-street, next morning, Poskel, still suffering from his evening's dissipation, summarily sentences Mrs. Poskel, her sister, the Colonel, and another military gentleman to "seven days' without the option of a fine." The straightening out of the miserable business, when the family skelston finally crumbles to pieces, is hugely diverting. Of course, all ends happily, and Mrs. Poskel and Cis are advanced to their proper positions in the tables of longevity.

The Caste was as follows:—

"THE MAGISTRATE."

Mr. Poskel and Mr. Bullamy...Magistrates of the Mulberry Street Police Court.....
Mr. A. C. Read & Mr. R. G. E. Forster.
Colonel Lukyn...From Bengal, retired .....
Mr. W. G. Bayne.
Captain Horace Vale...Shropshire Fusiliers
Mr. E. C. Davis.
Cis. Farringdon...Mrs. Poskel's son by her first marriage .....Mr. H. J. Sharp.
Achille Blond...Proprietor of the Hôtel des Princes .....Mr. L. Plummer.
Isidore.....A Waiter ...Mr. H. G. Parlett.
Mr. Wormington...Chief clerk at Mulberry Street .....Mr. C. I. Fraser.
Inspector Messiter, Sergeant Lugg, and Constable Harris...Metropolitan Police.....
Messrs. F. J. Lias, G. W. Bramhall, B. C. Howard
Wyke.....Servant at Mr. Poskel's.....
Mr. W. B. Clayton.
Agatha Poskel...Late Farringdon, née Verrinder.....Mrs. McWilliams.
Charlotte...Her Sister.....Mrs. Franklin Clark.
Beattie Tomlinson...A young lady reduced to teaching Music .....Miss Poole.
Popham.....A Parlour Maid.....Miss Morse.
Property Man—Mr. C. E. McWilliams.
Stage Manager—Mr. W. G. Bayne.

The house, needless to say, was packed to the doors—every seat in the Hall had been secured five days before, we are informed, and when the curtain rose it was to an expectant and sympathetic audience. Applause quickly rose, and then the laughter began to ripple, continuing almost uninterruptedly until the close. The performance in fact was the most signal success that has ever been achieved in Yokohama. Mr. A. C. Read, as Poskel, surpassed his previous records on the local stage. His impersonation of the character "went home" from the start and he carried his house with him to the end. Mr. Bayne, who carried on his shoulders the heavy responsibilities of stage manager, made a big hit as Colonel Lukyn, the proverbial irascible Anglo-Indian officer of the "curry-and-liver" order. It was good to hear his emphatic "By George!" and other strange oaths that invariably go with this particular genus. Mr. Forster had but a secondary part to play, but acted it well. Mr. Sharp's impersonation of Cis Farrington is the best thing he has ever given in Yokohama. The make-up, to begin with, was "simply killing;" and the manner in which the character was carried through showed that most conscientious labour had been bestowed upon it even to the smallest detail. Mr. Sharp, most unreservedly, may mark last evening's performance in his theatrical calendar with a white stone.

As Agatha Poskel, Mrs. McWilliams filled a congenial part excellently well, and long before she had run through the gamut of the emotions aroused in a maternal bosom by undoubting but misplaced faith in a precocious son, she had thoroughly won the appreciation of her audience. In her sister Charlotte, Mrs. Franklin Clark, we welcome a new aspirant to local honours. She carried out the part most creditably. Miss Poole as Beattie Tomlinson was a great success. But we might continue our eulogies over several columns had we the space at disposal. Honestly, it must be said, the minor parts played up to the principals capitally, combining to achieve a result creditable to all concerned. Hearty thanks are due to Mr. Bayne, and every one in his clever band of players, for the enjoyable evening afforded.

The Siam Observer hears that the long pending case in which the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation sued Phra Pakdee Patarakorn for the recovery of 131,541 ticals upon an overdraft, and which, after going through the International Court, the Appeal Court, and the Privy Council was decided in favour of the Bank, has now been settled by the defendant to the satisfaction of the Bank.

THE NEW CRICKET PAVILION.

The opening of the new pavilion on the ground of the Y.C. & A.C., will take place on Saturday, and now that the weather gives signs of being settled the Committee indulge in the hope that they will be able to carry out the football match and bicycle meet as originally arranged. We trust all members of the Club—young and old alike—will do their best to be present at the tiffin that day and thus strengthen the hands of the genial President, Mr. J. P. Mollison, and his hard-working Committee. The heads of firm, we think, should especially lend their support to the cricket club for through its agency, in the various allied sports, young fellows may keep their health in good trim and so make them the better fitted for the discharge of their business duties.

The Committee of the Y.C. & A.C. have decided to give a subscription ball at the Public Hall in aid of the Pavilion fund on the 20th inst. Coming as this will in Xmas week, the function should prove highly popular and an enjoyable reunion for the whole community Tickets can be obtained from members of the Committee, ladies, 2 yen, gentlemen 3 yen.

The new Cricket Pavilion is of two stories and constructed of timber, and at one end is a is clock tower containing the handsome clock presented by Mr. Abenheim—an extremely well-timed gift, it may be added, without any desire of punning. The wood employed is Oregon pine, painted a dark red. On the ground floor are the bar, the dressing rooms, storage room for playing gear, lavatories and bathrooms, while above is a large room for match luncheons and afternoon tea, the walls of which are decorated with sporting photographs and two handsome portraits of the President, Mr. J. P. Mollison, and the late Mr. Edgar Abbot, so well remembered as a thorough sportsman, and through whose exertions the various sporting clubs were amalgamated in 1884. A Committee room and a small storage room are also on the upper floor. The dressing room on the ground floor is extremely well arranged, and contains as many lockers as will amply accommodate all playing members. The baths and lavatories, too, are excellently arranged.

The erection of the new building is the outcome of a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Club early last year. It was then decided that the old pavilion, originally a single storied building, but to which a second story was added some 14 years ago, should be replaced by a larger and more commodious structure. The old edifice had become so crazy as to be almost untenable, and the provision of new quarters was forced on the Club. It was estimated that 3500 to 4000 yen would meet all the expenses, but this hope has proved to be fallacious, and the actual cost of the whole work, including the out buildings, will be more than 6000 yen. A generous response was made to the appeal for funds, and in a short time 3000 yen had been subscribed. Last autumn the committee accepted the plans of Mr. J. McD. Gardiner, of Tokyo, and the work was commenced last February. Unfortunately, Mr. Gardiner's ill-health prevented him giving for long his personal supervision to the work, and the responsibility fell on the Committee. It is almost an aphorism that management of things of this kind by Committees—unless it be a Committee of one man—is sure to be a grim failure. The present case, however, is the exception which proves the rule. The Committee has fulfilled its work most efficiently—chiefly, it must be admitted, by leaving the bulk of it to Mr. Mollison and the Vice-President, Mr. C. M. Duff. These gentlemen deserve the warmest gratitude of the members, and of all who are interested in sporting matters in Yokohama. They have had an immense amount of detail to see to, and the admirable manner in which they have carried out their labours is both a credit to themselves and a source of congratulation to the community.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Forest Lovers, a Romance, by MAURICE HEWLETT; London, MacMillan's Colonial Library: Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly & Walsh.

THE high lady, the Lady Isabel de Forz, Countess of Hauterive, Countess Dowager of March and Bellesme, and Lady of Morgraunt in her own right, was betrothed in her youth to Earl Roger of March and Bellesme, a man twice her age. Earl Roger went to the Crusades and one day young Fulk de Bréauté happened to find himself in the company of the lovely lady. He made eyes at her and Isabel lost her heart and then her head. She was secretly married to Fulk and a child was born to them. Then news came home that Roger, the great Earl, was returning from the wars, and Fulk and the Countess grew affrighted. Fulk took their infant to convey it to a place of safety, but that night, as he was crossing the forest of Morgraunt, Earl Roger's men fell suddenly upon him and he was stabbed to death. The child disappeared, and with her a crystal locket bearing the semblance of a pelican with a crown of thorns. The Countess then married Earl Roger, but he died soon; and in the long years of widowhood that ensued the Lady Isabel had many an hour to spend in wild regret and longing for the husband of her first youth and their child.

The years speed quickly by and Fate prepares her shuttle to weave a fresh pattern in the tangled web of the life of the great chatelaine of Hauterive and Morgraunt. Lovers come and lovers go but the Lady remains faithful. When least expected her child comes back to her aching heart, with the bitter experience of many strange and stirring adventures in field and hall, and accompanied by a youth of most goodly promise and redoubtable prowess. It is the tale of these three and their close connection with two other persons—a recreant monk and a thoroughly bad woman, even for mediæval days—that occupy the 384 pages of The Forest-Lovers. And exceedingly well-told is their story. It takes one, as the author says in his opening chapter, into times and spaces alike rude and uncivil. Blood is spilt, virgins suffer distresses, the horn sounds through woodland glades, dogs, wolves, deer, and men, Beauty and many Beasts tumble each other, seeking life or death with their proper tools. There is much mad work, but it is not devoid of entertainment. Long before he reaches the word Explicit, the reader will have learnt something of Morgraunt Forest and the Countess Isabel; will have perceived the duplicity of the Abbot of Holy Thorn; will have wandered with Isoult, that most gracious of maidens, and have discovered why she is called La Desirous; will have perceived what a doughty youth is Prosper le Gai, and will understand how a man may fall in love with his own wife; will have discovered also how near the brute the heart of Galors always remained and what desperate deeds he ventured—only to lose all and life in the end.

The book, without doubt, is a masterpiece of strenuous English prose, and will take front rank easily with the best romances that have been written in this generation. Critics of proved ability have spoken most highly of the tale, and even Mr. James Lane Allen, the hyper-sensitive author of The Choir Invisible, finds that it must, for several reasons, be regarded as of very unusual interest. "In the matter of style alone it is an achievement, an extraordinary achievement. Such a piece of English prose, saturated and racy with idiom, compact, and warm throughout as living human tissues, well deserves to be set apart for grateful study and express appreciation. In the matter of interpreting nature, there are passages in this book that I have never seen surpassed in prose fiction." Anyone in search of a gift-book for the approaching season need go no further than The Forest-Lovers, for it will charm and delight a very varied and extended circle of readers.

Rodman, the Boat-steerer, by LOUIS BECKE: London, Fisher Unwin's Colonial Library.

MR. LOUIS BECKE is an accomplished writer of short stories, and in the region that he has made peculiarly his own, is unsurpassed. In the collection of Pacific tales which we are now discussing he weaves before his reader's eyes a series of glowing pen pictures that transport us to the Isles afar, and we hear, as we traverse his pages, the hiss and boil of the "tumbling surf" on many a coral reef outside a placid calm of sheltered lagoons, and also learn to love the dusky people who were not so immoral as unmoral before the ruthless European came and forced upon them the ethics of a different civilization. But all the stories are not pleasant. Many deal with dark tragedies, with mutinies, with vindictive acts of cruelty that make the blood run cold. Yet all are worthy of attention.

We have also received from Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, a copy of Mr. Henry Seton Merriman's new book, Roden's Corner, which we hope to notice at length shortly. Like his former works, The Sowers and With Edged Tools, the novel has been received very favourably at home.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE JURISDICTION IN LIAOTUNG.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In regard to Mr. Fukuhara's case, you spoke as if the Japanese Government had implicitly recognized the Russian sovereignty established in the Liaotung Peninsula. But we hardly think that our Government has committed itself to such a serious blunder. Mr. Fukuhara was arrested, because he was suspected of being a military spy, when he landed at Port Arthur, which was then occupied by the Russian forces. This was, therefore, by no means, a civil case, and our Government did not find any ground to protest against the unfortunate arrest of Mr. Fukuhara. Truly the Japanese Government must have recognized the fact regarding the occupation of Liaotung Peninsula by the Russian forces, but it has by no means recognised the Russian sovereignty established in the same peninsula.

Your obedient servant,

KEIJIRO NAKAMURA.

Nagoya, December 3rd, 1898.

THE ORCHESTRAL TEMPEST IN THE SOCIAL TEA-POT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—As the recent concert in Yokohama appears to have been made the subject of very lively discussion,—though I admit I have seen nothing concerning it except what has appeared in the Mail,—I may perhaps be allowed to offer a few observations from the point of view of one who did not attend the entertainment, and to set forth the reasons why I was not tempted to be present. The ordinary amusement-seeker,—or art-lover, if you like,—is naturally influenced by the character of a programme, when the performances consist chiefly of orchestral and choral pieces. What he desires, and what he is willing to pay for, is as much variety, as much novelty, and as much excellence of selection and execution as possible. To a little novelty, at least, he thinks he is entitled. If he cannot have this, he expects variety and abundance; and failing these, he must be pretty well assured of the value of such music as is presented, and of the thoroughly good performance thereof, before he feels that the affair is worth his patronage. When the programme of the late concert was announced, I and doubtless many others, looked in vain for any of the features I have mentioned. Disjointed extracts from a familiar oratorio, deprived of their proper instrumental accompaniment, do not constitute an attraction of a high order; and an orchestral entertainment consisting of three numbers has certainly no quality of profusion or diversity. I say three numbers, because a violin solo cannot be classed with works of strictly orchestral design, the quantity being plainly insufficient, let us inquire how far the the other requirements were satisfied. Two of the pieces chosen were as destitute as they well could be of the merit of novelty, and their artistic value was not pronounced enough to overbalance this deficiency. The overture of Reissiger is gay and spirited, and would be well enough in its way if followed by more substantial matter; but as a pièce de resistance it is wholly inadequate. Perhaps, however, the Wedding March was intended as the pièce de resistance, though it is not really worthy of that distinction. It is woefully hackneyed, in the first place, and at its best it is not a very remarkable composition. Certainly it does not, like the overture in the same series, represent the finest characteristics of Mendelssohn's genius. Such pieces do not add much to the embellishment of a programme, and if given at all, their performance should be justified by exceptional skill in interpretation. This, however, was absolutely impossible with Mr. Junker's body of musicians. I was astonished to read in the Mail that the only wind instruments under his command were one high reed and one low brass. Now, of all pieces that could be chosen, the Wedding March especially demands the use of wind instruments. The pomp of its exordium is utterly lost without the three trumpets for which the author wrote; and its conclusion is marked by a series of effects which are entirely sacrificed by the employment of any substitute for the wood force. Consequently, this well-worn march could not have been duly executed by the orchestra in its present state, even if every member were a player of the highest conceivable grade. The dance music alone remains—pretty and graceful, but hardly valuable enough to atone for shortcomings in other directions.

It appears, then, that the music offered was extremely limited in quality and variety, was lacking in novelty, and could not be performed with anything approaching the effects contemplated by the composers. Concerts so administered cannot be expected to secure public favour for any length of time. Perhaps, if the truth were known, public favour is not precisely what the organization covets. The amateur entertainments of this community are one and all undertaken primarily for the gratification of the performers, and with very little regard to the opinion of the multitude. A good deal is said about artistic cultivation and the encouragement of a refined taste, but I always wonder how the people who indulge in talk of that kind can keep from bursting into laughter in one another's faces, like the Augurs in Gerome's famous picture. Our amateur actors and musicians mount the stage for their own admiration and that of their friends, and the theory that they serve as apostles of a lofty æsthetic purpose is a fallacy so childlike in simplicity that no one can possibly be deceived by it,—least of all themselves. I do not find fault with their motive. Without the stimulus of personal vanity there would probably be no public entertainments of any sort in a community like those of Yokohama and Tokyo; and, let the impulse be what it may, nobody can deny that very satisfactory results are often attained. We have good and enjoyable acting, and many of our unprofessional musicians possess genuine talent and praiseworthy skill. Their contributions to the diversion of Society will continue as long as they can gain distinction and win applause. But the same rule does not hold when an orchestra or chorus has to be considered. There is small chance of individual glorification when twenty or thirty persons are singing or playing in a mass; and for this reason the present combination will as surely fall to pieces without accomplishing anything of value as all its predecessors have done. The true artistic spirit, the zeal and devotion essential to solid achievement, are to the flighty fondness for new "sensations," transitory excitement, and notoriety, what the pennyworth of bread was to Falstaff's intolerable deal of sack. Yet it is a pity that while the new orchestra lasts, it should not do something to dignify its existence. Its error at the start seems to have been that of rushing into demonstration before it was ready, and insisting on a performance for which it had neither fitting instruments nor a sufficient repertory. I am confident that Mr. Junker is perfectly aware of these facts. His professional position is beyond discussion, and though he may not hitherto have been tested as a conductor, it is fair to assume that his experience with some of the finest orchestras in the world amply qualifies him for the duties he has been called upon to discharge. But bricks cannot be made without straw,—nor without a reasonable time for baking. The ablest of conductors must have the right material to work with, or his efforts will come to naught. The name of the Wedding March may be printed on a programme, but the promise can not be fulfilled by an orchestra that has no brass department. I have seen a statement that an attempt is made to compensate for the absence of wind instruments by using a small organ, or harmonium; and this expedient is serviceable, to a certain extent, for the filling in of harmonies. But when the wind is needed for prominent effects, no substitute will avail. Since the Wedding March had to be given, it would have been better worth while to engage Japanese trumpeters for the indispensable opening than to weaken the resonance of its attack by a thin imitation. But it is not my intention to touch upon details of this nature. I desire merely to establish the proposition that if the managers of the Society hope for prosperity, even during the short term to which their organization is destined, they must strive to deserve it. Concerts, in order to attract, must be made attractive. I dare say that Mr. Junker can show them how, if he is allowed a free hand and unfettered authority;—with the privilege of enlisting from outside such adjuncts as he deems necessary. If the members are not equal to all the demands of a properly constituted orchestra, they should fill the gaps from some other quarter. Whether they will do this,—whether, indeed, they will ever do anything to prove that they are animated by a wholesome and serious purpose, is a question that may puzzle many besides one who modis guisedly avows himself A SKEPTIC.

THE LATE CONCERT AT YOKOHAMA.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—I was unfortunately prevented from attending the recent Oratorio performance, and therefore I am not in a position to express my own humble opinion as to the merits or demerits of the effortson that occasion to do justice to such music. But I am truly astonished at the storm in a teacup that is evidently raging in Yokohama, over the criticism which appeared in the Mail and which to my mind certainly did not seem to be vitiated by malice. But amateurs the world over are proverbial for the filmy nature of their skins. The moment you add a drop of honest criticism to the concentrated syrup of fulsome praise for which their souls do hanker, you arouse a storm of impotent indignation. I do not suppose for a moment that Herr Junker himself sides with all this unseemly hubbub. He is too genuine an artist not to glance down with an indulgent smile at the antics of the naughty little asses in lion's skins, whom unfortunately for his temper he has to sway with his baton. The sequel of the concert is proving no doubt infinitely more amusing than the concert itself, but next time such a performance is to be given, it had better be done in camerâ for the sake of those poor martyrs whose susceptibilities are too tender to tolerate the shafts of the "chiel amang 'em takin' notes."

Yours obediently,

AMUSED OUTSIDER.

THE UNITED STATES AND COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—In view of the discussion of the feasibility of colonial government by the United States under the present constitution, the following extract from a judgment of the United States Circuit Court of appeals for California possesses much interest. The judgment was given in a case in which the appellants sought to have certain liquor legislation for the Territory of Alaska set aside as unconstitutional.

Judge W. W. Morrow, in declaring the decision of the Court, said:—

"The answer to these and other like objections urged in the brief of Counsel for the defendant is found in the now well established doctrine that the territories of the United States are entirely subject to the legislative authority of Congress. They are not organized under the constitution, nor subject to the complex distribution of the powers of Government as the organic law, but are the creation exclusively of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control. The United States having rightfully acquired the territories, and being the only government which can impose laws upon them, have the entire domain and sovereignity, national, municipal, federal and state. Under this full and comprehensive authority, Congress has unquestionably the power to exclude intoxicating liquors from any or all of its territories, or limit their sale under such regulations as it may prescribe. It may legislate in accordance with the special needs of each locality, and vary its regulations to meet the circumstance of the people. Whether the subject elsewhere would be a matter of local police regulations or within the State control under some other power, it is immaterial to consider; in a territory, all the functions of government are within the legislative jurisdiction of Congress, and may be exercised through a local government or directly by such legislation as we have now under consideration."

The writer of the article, from a foot note to which the above is taken, then goes on to say:—

"In other words, the colonies are under the absolute control of Congress, subject to no restrictions of any sort, and free from the operation of any form of constitutional checks and balances. Only through such freedom is colonial government under the United States possible." See Atlantic Monthly for November, 1898, page 590. Yours etc.

ELASTICITY OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—In an editorial note on "The Philippines" in the Japan Daily Mail for Saturday, the 3rd inst., you express a doubt whether "the Constitution (of the United States) is sufficiently elastic to be extended to the contingencies now in sight," especially in connection with "military operations on a large scale." Inasmuch as the U S. Government has recently been able to carry on certain military operations on a somewhat large scale against Spain, it is a little difficult to understand in what point embarrassment will arise in the future. The U.S. constitution specifically grants to Congress the power "to raise and support armies," to provide and maintain a navy and "to make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces." It is not necessary to "consult the views of the several States" as States, though it may be wise to consult public opinion.

Respectfully yours,

ERNEST W. CLEMENT.

JAPANESE BAZAAR.

A pretty and interesting charity bazaar was held on Thursday evening at the Public Hall in aid of the funds for the Hokkaido sufferers, the Yokohama Orphanage, and temperance work in Yokohama. The affair took place in the Public Hall, and the hours during which it remained open were weirdly long—from 10 a.m. to six p.m. and from 7 p.m. to 11 p.m. In the afternoon there were a good many European visitors, but the evening performance was attended almost wholly by Japanese who patronised freely the tasteful little stalls for the sale of all kinds of artistic nothings, and ate and drank copiously of the tea and refreshments—chiefly fish and rice prepared in a multitude of mysterious ways—provided in what is usually the cloak room. It was not an orthodox bazaar in the sense that prices were in no cases beyond the limit of moderation, and in many instances ridiculously low. The Japanese young men and maidens who conduct the sales have not reached the high level of the west, where people victimise each other for the sake of charity, and bargain like hucksters for a church fund. There was an exhibition of Japanese paintings in western style—and a very hideous style for the most part, but charity covereth all things, and some were not so bad. As for the stage performances praise is really due to them. The sword exercises and dances, in which Mrs. Sugimoto Masa and Mrs. Murakami Hideo took the chief part, were most interesting to a foreign onlooker, while the chief feature of the entertainment programme, the Delsarte pantomime, was a great success. It was given by the girls of the mission school, who have been trained by Miss Dorsey, and, considering that they have only been practising a very short time, the result was admirable. The pantomime consists of the reading of some popular poem (Poe's "Raven" was the one we heard, and it was very sweetly read by one of the Japanese scholars), and the ladies on the stage, dressed in classical costumes, make in unison and to musical accompaniment poses and gestures in harmony with the incidents and language of the piece. The effect was very graceful, though in less skilful hands the thing might easily have developed into burlesque. We trust the charities concerned will benefit largely by the efforts of the performers.

HIGH COUNCIL OF AGRICULTURE, INDUSTRY, AND COMMERCE.

(CONCLUDED.)

The representations forwarded by the members of the Council during its session numbered 15, of which the one presented by Mr. Taguchi and two others in regard to the incidence and amount of taxes upon manufactures, were passed by the Council, steps being taken to present them to the Government in the form of a memorial. The rest of the Representations were not discussed on account of the date of the session of the Diet being too close at hand. Nevertheless, with the exception of a representation submitted by Mr. Inouye Jintaro and one other member in connection with the establishment of offices for the testing of mineral fertilizers, the others received due attention at the hands of the Investigation Committee, by whom resolutions were passed as enumerated below for purposes of reference:—

November, 31st year of Meiji.

1.—Representation in regard to the training of industrial engineers.

2.—Representation in regard to despatching engineers abroad.

Investigation Committee:—

Tanaka Yoshio, Chairman,
Teshima Seiichi, Suzuki Chozo, Horita Rentaro, Matsuda Gengoro } Members.

Report in regard to the above:—

At a meeting of the Committee held on the 28th October in regard to the Representations above referred to, the following resolutions were passed:—

October 29th, the 31st year of Meiji.

Tanaka Yoshio, Chairman.

To Mr. Shibusawa Eiichi, President of the High Agricultural, Commercial, and Industrial Council.

Representation in regard to the training of Industrial Engineers.—Japan has proved herself wanting in the means of training engineers and industrial experts, and as deficiency exists at present in the supply of such experts the inevitable result is that unskilled engineers are frequently employed both in Government and private workshops. The development of industry is an urgent necessity, but it can not be accomplished without the aid of experienced engineers. Although the Treasury has now determined to grant aids to local technical schools with a view to training students in such a manner as to enable them to qualify as artisans or foremen of artisans, yet, with the exception of two or three Government schools, no arrangement has yet been made for training engineers above the rank of artisans. Under these circumstances it is quite natural that the number of able and eminent engineers should have been small. Technical schools where eminent engineers may be trained require so large an amount of outlay for their organization and maintenance that a single city or prefecture could scarcely be expected to bear the expense. Thus a necessity exists for formulating schemes for the training of engineers of a greater efficiency than has hitherto been attained, at the expense of the State, so that pace may be kept in this point with the development of industry. The council having arrived at a resolution as remarked above, the same is presented to Your Excellency in the form of a Representation in accordance with Article II. of the Regulations of the Council:—

SHIBUSAWA EIICHI,
President of the High A.C.I.C.

To the Minister of Education.

Representation in regard to despatching a number of engineers abroad.—We are informed that measures have hitherto been taken by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce to despatch a certain number of students to foreign countries for the purpose of training them as engineers, but we may take the liberty to state that the number of students so despatched is hardly sufficient to meet the requirements of the time—a time in which there is absolute necessity for the cultivation of industrial enterprise of all descriptions. The importation of manufactured articles during the past few years has been steadily increasing in quantity and value, while the export of manufactures of our country has shown a tendency to decrease. These facts, it may be presumed, are attributable to want of skill and experience on the part of our engineers. The Department of Agriculture and Commerce ought to adopt measures for despatching a greater number of students or engineers abroad, so that they might be more effectually trained in their profession and render more efficient assistance in the development of industry. As for the qualifications of engineers to be so despatched, the branches of science to be studied, the obligation devolving on them after their return to Japan, and other important questions, the officials concerned may take appropriate steps to meet requirements; but as the country's financial condition at present demands the immediate adoption of schemes calculated to diminish imports and encourage exports, it is advisable that as large number of engineers shall be despatched abroad as funds will allow.

SHIBUSAWA EIICHI,
President of the A.C.I.C.

To Mr. OISHI MASAMI,
Minister of Agriculture and Commerce.

Representation relating to the distribution of papers and reports showing the result of investigations in regard to agriculture, commerce, and industry.

Investigation Committee:—

Sakatani Yoshiro, Chairman.
Inouye Jintaro, Endo Keishi, Suzeki Jubi, Yokoi Tokiyoshi } Members.

Report in respect to the above:—I have the honour to inform you that at a meeting of the committee held on the 28th October with regard to a representation concerning the distribution of reports and other papers showing the result of investigations carried on with respect to agriculture, commerce, and industry, the following resolution was passed:—

Sakatani Yoshiro, Chairman.

To Mr. Shibusawa Eiichi, President of the A.C.I.C.

The representation above referred to secures the sympathy of the Council, but as it seems to have been customary for the officials concerned to print as well as distribute the various reports as suggested in the representation so far as the funds allowed, necessity exists for presenting a special memorial on the subject.

Representation in regard to the appointment of agricultural Inspectors or Overseers.

Representation in regard to the extension of business conducted in the main and branch offices established for the inspection of agricultural products, and in regard to the encouragement of agricultural produce devoted to special purposes.

Representation with regard to obtaining aids from the Treasury for the maintenance of Agricultural Inspection Offices in the various cities and prefectures.

Representation relating to the constitution of vessels needed for the investigation of marine products, as well as for training in investigation.

Representation concerning the distribution of seeds and vegetable sprouts throughout the Empire.

Investigation Committee:—

Murata Tamotsu, Chairman.
Watarase Torajiro, Kanai Nobu, Tanaka Yoshio, Yokoi Tokiyoshi, Yamamoto Kametaro, Oguri Torajiro, Tamari Kizo, Inouye Jintaro } Members.

A Report in respect to the above:—

I have to honour to inform you that the following resolutions were passed on the 29th October at a conference of the Committee in connection with the last five representations submitted:—

October 31st, in the 31st year of Meiji.

Murata Tamotsu, Chairman.

To Mr. Shibusawa Eiichi, President of the High A.C.I.C.

Of the five Representations the first two were passed without any alteration. With regard to the third, namely, a representation calling for aids from the Treasury for the maintenance of Agricultural Inspection Offices in the various cities and prefectures, the amount nominally fixed at 1,500 yen was altered to a proper sum, the other portion being passed in its entirety. The fourth and fifth Representations were also passed without alteration.

Representation in regard to the establishment of Sericultural Investigation Councils.

Murata Tamotsu, Chairman
Watarase Torajiro, Kanai Nobu, Tanaka Yoshio, Yokoi Tokiyoshi, Yamamoto Kametaro, Oguri Tomijiro, Tamari Kizo, Inouye Jintaro } Members.

Representation for holding a meeting for the discussion of questions in regard to the sericultural industry:—

Among the various exports from Japan silk occupies the most conspicuous position. It is beyond doubt that the national economy and the development of national resources are considerably influenced by the vicissitudes of the silk trade. But if we look at the condition of the silk industry in the interior we find that silk worm eggs are of every conceivable dissimilarity, in consequence of which sericulturists have failed and still fail to secure uniformity in thread. The process of rearing, too, remains unimproved, while every silk district suffers each year by gross miscalculations or failures in crop. Moreover, the reduction in the area of mulberry farms which takes place year by year evidences a serious decline of the industry. In point of quality or fineness the Japanese silks can hardly venture to compete with those of Italy or France, while in the amount of production they are behind China, which has now secured the reputation of producing an improved class of silk. The favour of foreign consumers towards the Japanese manufactures has steadily decreased, and the cry of dissatisfaction is growing louder and louder. Unless remedial measures are immediately taken to secure the permanent stability of the industry there is reason to fear that Japanese silk, the most important article of commerce, will be driven out of foreign markets. It is therefore advisable that the Department of Agriculture and Commerce at this conjuncture should take steps to convoke a number of experienced sericulturists to investigate and determine the general policy to be pursued.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

Representation regarding measures for securing the smooth circulation of money and lowering the rates of interest.

Investigation Committee:—

Sakatani Yoshiro, Chairman
Takahashi Korekiyo, Matsuda Gengoro, Doi Michio, Tokokawa Kyohei, Endo Keishi, Hamaoka Kotetsu } Members.

With regard to the above representation the following resolution was passed:—

The methods available for the steady circulation of money may be manifold, but with regard to those which require immediate adoption the following remarks may be made:—

I. Extension of legal limits for the issue of convertible notes free from taxes leviable on the security reserves of the Bank of Japan.

Since the 23rd year of Meiji the amount of convertible bank notes issued free of taxes upon the security reserves has been limited to 85 million yen. Comparing that year with the present it will be found that, owing to the extraordinary development of agriculture, commerce, and industry, foreign trade has trebled in volume, bringing about a corresponding increase in the demand for currency. The issue of paper in excess of the security of 85 millions of yen requires at present a payment of tax at the rate of 5 per cent. The system can hardly fail to enhance the rate of interest and consequently to obstruct the circulation of money. The circulation of convertible notes on which taxes are levied should be resorted to only as a temporary expedient in anticipation of a time of panic or other extraordinary occasions. In no way is it justifiable to enforce such a system in ordinary times, as it is calculated to obstruct the process of adjustment in monetary operations. The Government, it may be suggested, ought to alter the Convertible Bank Notes Regulations, in such a way as to increase the amount of issue to 120 million yen without levying a tax on the security reserve.

II.—The Bank of Japan's obligation consequent upon the increase in the issue of notes free of interest on security reserves.

Since the augmentation in the amount of issue would be virtually an expansion of the privileges of the Bank of Japan, the Bank may be ordered to adopt the following measures in compensation:—

1. In Foreign commerce Japan has to compete with foreign capital at low interest, and therefore greater attention should be paid to lowering the rate of interest with regard to discounts allowed on foreign exchange bills, in order that the development of trade may be effected with greater facility.

2. Gradual establishment of branches or out-offices in places of commercial and industrial importance, in the interior, where no such institutions exist, and the inauguration of a more extended system of issuing loans in the case of ordinary banks.

3. Remittances in the interior through the main office of the Nippon Ginko or its branches or out offices, should be dealt with free of charge.

4. Greater facilities should be given in discounting domestic commercial bills, so as to secure the development of credit.

5. A policy should be adopted for altering the bonds included in the security reserves in such a way as to render them freely saleable in foreign markets.

6. Active steps should be taken to remedy abuses and anomalies connected with the circulation in different localities of various coins and paper, especially of subsidiaries.

III.—Opening a path for the use of small cheques or deposit bills for which the banks are responsible, in making payments or presenting securities to the Treasury. In dealing with the Treasury the most convenient and at the same time unobjectionable methods should be adopted, and a cheque system restricted to banks of known credit, would promote the circulation of money. The use of small cheques for which substantial banks are responsible is, in no way objectionable. Sums of money which have hitherto been received by the Government in the form of personal securities or securities for public tender, in accordance with General Accounts Regulations or other rules, have been limited to specie or public loan bonds. But it is desirable, in cases where no valid reason for objection exists, that the use of deposit bills issued by substantial banks should be allowed so as to open a path for the utilization of the credit of banks. The above resolution is submitted in the form of a representation in accordance with Article II. of the Regulations for the High Agricultural Commercial, and Industrial Council.

November 2nd, in the 31st year of Meiji.

SHIBUSAWA EIICHI,
President of the Council.

To His Excellency OISHI MASAMI,
Minister of Agriculture and Commerce.

TROUBLED KOREA.

"Land of the Morning Calm—and Afternoon Repose"

can no longer be applied to Korea. At the present moment she is a more distressful country than Ireland ever was, even in the dark days of last century. The puppet Emperor who sits on the Throne of the peninsula empire is a poor, shiftless creature, swaying from this side to that as the wind of party politics may blow upon him: never knowing his own mind; truckling to this faction to-day and to that the next; pleading for peace and quiet and whining when he finds that his desires go entirely unheeded; fretfully storming at his advisers, or fuming at his favourites. A sorry spectacle in very sooth. Meanwhile things go from bad to worse in his empire; robbery is rampant everywhere; business is paralyzed; Justice hides her head, being bartered to the highest bidder; and tumults and commotions, riots, murders, house-burnings and sackings take place at the very gates of the palace.

The latest issues of the Independent to hand are painful reading. One day the Independence Club is on top: next the Pedlars. Mass meetings are held in front of the Palace gates by either party, and every now and again one or other is dispersed. Sōul has had five Governors since the beginning of November. The last appointee was Mr. Yun, the erstwhile proscribed President of the Independence Club and editor of the Independent. It was deemed doubtful whether he would accept the office, or, if he did, if he would remain there long. When our last mail advices left Sōul, the Pedlars were the party on top, having succeeded in winning the Emperor to their side, but the telegrams show that they had short shrift, and that the Independents ultimately won the day.

Who are the Pedlars? We turn to the columns of the Independent for an answer. That paper says:—"It goes without saying that they are not the bona fide 'travelling merchants,' whose strict discipline and compact organization made them, in former days, an object of admiration among the lower classes of Korea. The pedlars, so-called, now in Sōul are mostly made up of ex soldiers, ex-police men, ex righteous-army-men, ex-Tonghak leaders, ex-slaves, ex-servants, ex-shop keepers, ex-alms house people, in short ex everything collected from the city and the suburbs by the promises and purse of Hong Jongwoo, the ex-assasin; Yu Kuiwhan the Extraordinary Envoy; Yi Kuitong the ex-Vice Minister of Law; Kil Yongik, the ex magistrate of Kwachun; Yi Yongik, the ex-Director of Mines, backed by several Excellencies in the Government. The crowd has been strengthened by coolies and gatemen from the streets who join the glorious guild for the comfortable 15 yang (60 cents) per day. No wonder that a crowd of such promiscuous hoodlums, knowing, as they do, that they are the pets of the Palace favourites, should have already shown themselves insolent and oppressive. They enter into a shop, take what they like, pay as much or rather as little as they want."

"During the night of the 21st Nov. the houses of the Five Villains, so-called, were demolished by the infuriated mob. No one condemns these riotous proceedings more than the ex-Independent men out of whose control the Pedlars have driven away the patient people of Sōul." The five villains are the gentlemen mentioned above as the financial backers of the Pedlars.

The soldiers stationed along the streets leading to the Palace are well behaved and do not in the least molest foreigners going to and fro. But the Independent feared that the Pedlars may turn on foreigners after they have "cleaned up" the People's Union.

The Korean Cabinet resigned in a body on the 24th, after a vain attempt to persuade His Majesty to disperse the Pedlars, prosecute the Five Villains, and grant the popular demands. So says the Independent.

THE GREAT FUR CASE.

IN H.B.M. COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before H. S. Wilkinson Esq., Judge, sitting with a Jury.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 6TH, 1898.

REGINA V. CHARLES EMIL LEOPOLD.

APPLICATION FOR POSTPONEMENT.

The Leopold case, locally important as it is, is not that species of cause celèbre that arouses much popular excitement apart from personal concern in the parties involved. There is not much human interest in bills of lading, invoices, exhibits A and B., and the intricacies of the Larceny Act. The story of the head and hunt of Mr. Leopold's alleged offending is not entertaining, even when it has the advantage of the truly literary exposition of which it has been made the subject in the indictment given below. Accordingly it was not a matter for surprise that the Court room was not inconveniently crowded on Tuesday morning when the Court opened. There were a rather woeful-looking crowd of potential jurors at the back of the Court, gloomy at the possibility of a week or two of intolerable ennui and grave interference with business or pleasure. When the unlucky five were finally caught the rest beamed with satisfaction, and went on their path rejoicing, leaving the Court almost empty of all but witnesses and unofficials. The usual batch of excuses were sent in—several of them quite genuine. Mr. Lines caused some amusement by his forcible way of showing cause why he should not be a Juror: (1) he had a headache; (2) he had sciatica; and (3) he had a prejudice against the prisoner. Which of these reasons seemed him his congé was not clear, but Mr. Lines was excused. Another was lucky enough to escape on account of deafness. Five who had been called and did not appear were fined $50 each.

The scene in the Court was not very dramatic—like the case itself. The accused appeared a trifle more anxious than at the preliminary hearing. He was standing most of the morning, but later obtained permission to be seated. He was evidently disappointed at the failure of his counsel's effort to secure a postponement of the trial, and listened with a rather dispirited air to the enormously long indictment, through which the Clerk of the Court bravely waded, almost sprightly at first, gravely in the middle, and exhaustedly at the finish. It was a masterpiece of style. At the conclusion the clerk had retained sufficient self-possession to put the usual formula to the prisoner: "How, say you, Charles Emil Leopold, are you guilty or not guilty?" "and the accused replied in a firm voice: "Not guilty."

Mr. H. C. Litchfield, Crown Prosecutor, with Mr. J. R. Lowder, appeared to prosecute; Professor Terry appeared for the defence; and Mr. A. B. Walford represented the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

Before the indictment was read Professor Terry rose and said:—I am afraid I shall have to move for a postponement of this trial. I did not expect, but I received yesterday evening, a letter which I have shown to counsel on the other side from Mr. Leopold's brother in London. We have been, I may say, ever since this affair first began in correspondence with him trying to find out whether we could get any evidence of any importance. Until I received this letter I had no reason to suppose there was anything of importance that he could lay before the Court. Now he writes that he is sending by the mail which follows this a sworn statement which would tend to show that Messrs. Ahrens and Company had a knowledge of what Mr. Leopold was doing at this time. This appears to me to have very considerable bearing on the question of fraudulent intent, and is of importance. What the contents of the statement are I cannot say, for the letter is brief.

The Judge—Would it be evidence in the case at all?

Mr. Terry—It would not be evidence, but it might give us the opportunity of applying for leave to take the testimony of Mr. Leopold's brother in London.

The Judge—But can you take testimony in London in a criminal case here?

Mr. Terry—If I cannot there is nothing more to be said. I have not had time to look the matter up. Mr. Leopold has offered to come, and if the sworn statement happens to be concerning facts that he personally knows I can have him come. I will say, your Honour, that I did not expect until this morning that I should have to make any such motion, or I should have spoken of it before.

His Honour—Let me see the letter. (After perusing it): The first part of this would be to show that there was not only fraud on the part of the defendant, but that he was in conspiracy to defraud.

Mr. Terry—Not necessarily. He is charged in the indictment with defrauding Ahrens and Co.

His Honour—That is one count only.

Mr. Terry—I do not think it would show conspiracy to defraud. It would simply show a careless manner of dealing with the consent of his firm.

His Honour—According to this the person would swear that Ahrens and Co. knew that the accused had signed bills of lading for goods that had not been put on board the ship. Would that assist your client in the slightest degree?

Mr. Terry—It would certainly show that she did not intend to defraud Ahrens & Co.

His Honour—Is there any other point?

Mr. Terry—I think not.

His Honour—Then I decline to grant the motion. (After a pause) You will see that this letter is dated the 17th September.

Mr. Terry—Yes, it came, Mr. Leopold tells me, a few days ago. I am not sure as to the exact date. It might be ten days ago possibly. It was sent to me yesterday.

His Honour (after making notes)—I refuse the application. Is there anything else?

Mr. Terry—That is all. I don't know whether it would be proper for me to accept formally.

His Honour—I may point out to you, Mr. Terry, that I am willing to take note of any exception at all, but for a postponement of the trial I must of course have something on oath. If you could have shown me a private letter, or statement, then I would, of course, have had it put in train, if I could have done it. I have had no statement, only what you say of what this letter could prove. You would see at once that your note of objection is useless as there is nothing sworn before me.

Mr. Terry—I had not time to prepare an affidavit, and the only affidavit I could have made would have been that I had received this letter and that I believed the statements made in it to be true.

His Honour—If you wish me to note the objection, I will note the objection, but I shall have to note that there is no sworn statement.

Mr. Terry—If a sworn statement is of any use can I put it in afterwards? Can we consider it as if there were a sworn statement?

His Honour—Assuming this were sworn in a case like this I can't give you the benefit, unless it were to prevent a real injustice being done.

Mr. Terry—You would refuse if it were a sworn statement?

His Honour—Yes, the only thing to be sworn would be that the letter has been received, and that you thought the statement to be true.

Mr. Terry—I may say that we had made all possible efforts to obtain evidence and had been in correspondence with Mr. Leopold's brother.

His Honour—Yes, you have done your best, Mr. Terry.

Mr. Terry—Yes, I know I have done my best. I only wanted to know if I could do anything further.

His Honour—I think not. The application is refused.

ANOTHER APPLICATION.

Mr. Litchfield then applied to amend the figures in the first count from yen 41,421.32 to yen 42,816 76. The error was owing to a miscalculation on his part. The same mistake had occurred in the second and fifth counts, and he applied that they be amended also.

This was done.

THE INDICTMENT.

The Clerk of the Court (Mr. C. D. Moss) then read the indictment as follows:—

IN HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S COURT FOR JAPAN, KANAGAWA TO WIT:

Henry Charles Litchfield, Crown Prosecutor in Japan for our Lady the Queen presents and charges that Charles Emil Leopold, a British subject at Yokohama, Japan, on the thirty-first day of December in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, unlawfully knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to one Herbert Maurice Bevis, the Manager of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at Yokohama aforesaid, that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped at the port of Yokohama on board the German steamship Hohenzollern ten cases of furs of the alleged value of twelve hundred and fifty pounds sterling and that he had also been possessed of and had shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern forty bales of furs of the alleged value of three thousand pounds sterling to be carried by the said steamship and other steamships connecting with the same from the port of Yokohama to the port of London and there to be delivered to the order of him the said Charles Emil Leopold, and that the said furs had been duly insured against loss by perils of the seas during the voyage aforesaid, by means of which false pretences he the said Charles Emil Leopold did then unlawfully cause and procure the sum of fortysone thousand four hundred and twenty-one yen and thirty-two sen of the monies of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to be transferred and paid to the Bank account of him the said Charles Emil Leopold for his use and benefit with intent to defraud; whereby he did obtain from the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation the said sum of forty-one thousand four hundred and twenty-one yen and thirty-two sen with intent to defraud, whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern the said ten cases of furs or any of them and whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship the said forty bales of furs or any of them and whereas in truth and fact he had not insured the said ten cases of furs or the said forty bales of furs or any part of them as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the Statute in such case made and provided and against the Peace of our Lady the Queen Her Crown and Dignity, SECOND COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor for our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that afterwards on the said thirty-first day of December in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven at Yokohama aforesaid the said Charles Emil Leopold unlawfully knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis, the Manager of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the German steamship Hohenzollern certain furs to be carried by the said steamer to London and that he was then on the thirty first day of December lawfully possessed of two bills of lading signed by Messrs. H. Ahrens & Co., Nachf., one of the said bills of lading representing ten cases of furs marked (L I in a diamond above 9 8) 46/55 and the other of them representing forty bales of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 9 8) 56/95 and also that he was lawfully possessed of two several policies of insurance signed by H. Ahrens & Co. Nachf. as Agents for the London Assurance Corporation, by which policies of insurance the said ten cases of furs and the said forty bales of furs were purported to be insured by the said Corporation against perils of the seas on the said voyage to London, by means of which said false pretences he did cause and procure the said Herbert Maurice Bevis to purchase with the money of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation a bill of exchange drawn by the said Charles Emil Leopold on C. M. Lampson & Co., London, for twelve hundred and fifty pounds payable four months after sight another bill of exchange drawn by the said Charles Emil Leopold on C. M. Lampson & Co. aforesaid for three thousand pounds payable four months after sight, and did cause and procure the proceeds of the said two bills of exchange to be paid to the Bank account of him the said Charles Emil Leopold for his use and benefit and that thereby he the said Charles Emil Leopold unlawfully obtained forty one thousand four hundred and twenty one yen and thirty two sen of the moneys of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation with intent to defraud, whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern the said furs or any of them. And whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold was not then lawfully possessed of the said two bills of lading or either of them, and whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold was not lawfully possessed of the said two policies of insurance as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace of our Lady the Queen Her Crown and Dignity.

THIRD COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor for Our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that afterwards on the said thirty-first day of December in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven the said Charles Emil Leopold being at the time aforesaid indebted to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at Yokohama aforesaid in the sum of forty thousand seven hundred and fifty yen and eighty-eight sen, he the said Charles Emil Leopold on the said thirty first day of December wrote a letter to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation aforesaid stating therein that he the said Charles Emil Leopold did send therewith to the said Banking Corporation complete B/L Policy in duplicate and invoices for Lt in a diamond above 9 8 46/55 ten cases furs shipped per N.D.L. steamer Hohenzollern at Yokohama for London via Suez Canal and that a certain Bill of Exchange for twelve hundred and fifty pounds referred to and enclosed in the said letter and drawn by him against the said goods was in accordance with C. M. Lampson & Co.'s telegraphed credit and on the said thirty-first day of December he the said Charles Emil Leopold wrote another letter to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation stating therein that he the said Charles Emil Leopold did send therewith to the said Banking Corporation complete B/L policy in duplicate and invoices for (L I in a diamond above 9 8) 56/95 forty bales furs shipped per N. D. L. steamer Hohenzollern at Yokohama for London via Suez Canal and that a certain Bill of Exchange for three thousand pounds referred to and enclosed in the said letter and drawn by him against the said goods was accordance with the said C. M. Lampson & Co's telegraphed credit whereby he the said Charles Emil Leopold did unlawfully, knowingly and designedly falsely pretend to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation that he had shipped on board the said German steamship Hohenzollern the ten cases of furs and forty bales of furs as aforesaid to be carried from Yokohama to London and had insured the said furs and that the two Bills of Exchange aforesaid for twelve hundred and fifty pounds sterling and for three thousand pounds sterling respectively were in accordance with a certain letters of credit issued by the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at the request of a certain firm known to the said Banking Corporation as C. M. Lampson & Co. of London, by means of which said false pretences he the said Charles Emil Leopold did then unlawfully cause and procure the sum of forty thousand seven hundred and fifty yen and eighty eight sen of the moneys of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to be paid and transferred to his bank account with the said Banking Corporation in discharge of his indebtedness to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation for his use and benefit, and did thereby obtain the said sum of forty thousand seven hundred and fifty yen and eighty-eight sen from the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation with intent to defraud, whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern the said ten cases of furs or any of them, and whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern the said forty bales of furs or any of them or any part of them, and whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not insured the said ten cases of furs or the said forty bales of furs or any of them or any part of them, and whereas in truth and in fact the said Bills of Exchange for twelve hundred and fifty pounds and for three thousand pounds were not nor was either of them in accordance with the said C M. Lampson & Co.'s telegraphed credit as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the Peace of Our Lady the Queen Her Crown and Dignity.

FOURTH COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor in Japan for Our Lady the Queen doth further present and charge that Charles Emil Leopold a British subject at Yokohama Japan on the said thirty first day of December in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven unlawfully knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to one Albert Hofmann a partner in the firm or Co-partnership of Henry Ahrens and Company Nachfolger at Yokohama aforesaid that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped or caused to be shipped on board the German steamship Hohenzollern at Yokohama ten cases of furs numbered 46 to 55 and also forty bales of furs numbered 56 to 59 by means of which said false pretences the said Charles Emil Leopold did then unlawfully and fraudulently cause or induce the said Albert Hofmann to write the name of the firm or Co-partnership of Henry Ahrens and Company Nachfolger acting as Agents for the said steamship upon two separate bills of lading the first of the said bills of lading purporting to acknowledge the receipt on board the steamship Hohenzollern of the ten cases of furs aforesaid and the second of the said bills of lading purporting to acknowledge the receipt on board the steamship Hohenzollern of the forty bales of furs aforesaid in order that the said bills of lading might be converted and dealt with as valuable securities with intent thereby then to defraud and injure the said Henry Ahrens and Company Nachfolger whereas in truth and in fact at the times aforesaid he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped or caused to be shipped on board the steamship Hohenzollern the said ten cases of furs or any of them, and whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the steamship Hohenzollern the said forty bales of furs or any of them as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the times he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace of Our Lady the Queen her Crown and Dignity,

FIFTH COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor for Our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that afterwards on the said thirty-first day of December in the year aforesaid Charles Emil Leopold at Yokohama aforesaid did unlawfully designedly and knowingly falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis the Manager of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at Yokohama aforesaid that he the said Charles Emil Leopold before the said thirty-first day of December had shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern ten cases of furs of the alleged value of twelve hundred and fifty pounds sterling and that he had also shipped on board the said steamship forty bales of furs of the alleged value of three thousand pounds sterling and that he had caused the said furs to be insured against loss by perils of the seas on the voyage from Yokohama to London by means of which said false pretences he induced the said Herbert Maurice Bevis to purchase with the moneys of the said banking corporation a bill of exchange for twelve hundred and fifty pounds drawn by him the said Charles Emil Leopold on C. M Lampson & Co. of London payable four months after sight and another bill of exchange for three thousand pounds sterling drawn by the said Charles Emil Leopold on the said C. M. Lampson & Co., payable four months after sight and thereby incurred a liability to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in the sum of forty one thousand four hundred and twenty-one yen and thirty-two sen for which said sum he then obtained credit with the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not at the time of incurring the said liability or at any other time shipped the said ten cases of furs or the said forty bales of furs or any of them or any part of them, and whereas he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not caused to be insured against the perils of the seas the said furs or any of them as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace of our Lady the Queen her Crown and Dignity.

SIXTH COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor for our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that the said Charles Emil Leopold at Yokohama aforesaid on the tenth day of January in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight unlawfully knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis, the Manager of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at Yokohama aforesaid by writing a letter stating in the words and figures following that is to say:—

Yokohama, 10th January, 1898.

From H. Ahrens and Co., Nachf.

And further that on the fifteenth days of February in the year aforesaid the said Charles Leopold at Yokohama aforesaid by writing a letter similar in terms except as to the figures therein as the one set out as aforesaid addressed to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation and unlawfully knowingly and designedly falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the steamship aforesaid to be carried from Yokohama to London four cases of furs marked and numbered L. I. in a diamond above 9 8 166/169 and that he had duly insured the said furs and that a bill of exchange for one thousand pounds sterling drawn by him at four months after sight on C. M. Lampson and Company aforesaid was in accordance with a credit issued by the said Banking Corporation at the request of C. M. Lampson and Company aforesaid by means of which false pretences the said Charles Emile Leopold unlawfully caused and procured the further sum of nine thousand and seven hundred and seventy yen and ninety-nine sen of the moneys of the said Banking Corporation to be transferred and paid to his bank account with the said banking corporation for his use and benefit with intent to defraud and did thereby obtain from the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation the said sum of nine thousand seven hundred and seventy yen and ninety-nine sen with intent to defraud, and further that on the nineteenth day of February in the year aforesaid the said Charles Emil Leopold at Yokohama aforesaid by writing another letter in similar terms except as to the figures therein as the one set out as aforesaid addressed to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation unlawfully, knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the aforesaid steamship ten packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 9 8) 185/194 and that he had duly insured the said furs and that the two several bills of exchange one for eleven hundred and twenty-five pounds sterling and the other for eight hundred and seventy-five pounds sterling drawn by him at four months after sight on C. M. Lampson and Co., London were in accordance with a letter of credit issued by the said Banking Corporation at the request of the said C. M. Lampson and Co. by means of which false pretences he the said Charles Emil Leopold unlawfully caused and procured the further sum of nineteen thousand five hundred and forty-one yen and ninty-nine sen of the moneys of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to be paid and transferred to the bank account of him the said Charles Emil Leopold with the said Banking Corporation with intent to defraud and that he did thereby obtain from the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation the said sum of nineteen thousand five hundred and forty-one yen and ninty nine sen with intent to defraud, and further, that the said Charles Emil Leopold on the seventh day of April in the year aforesaid at Yokohama aforesaid by writing two other letters of the same date in similar except as to the figures therein to the one set out as aforesaid addressed to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation unlawfully, knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the steamship aforesaid nine packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond about 9 8,) 195/203 and ten packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 9. 8, 204/213 to be carried from Yokohama to London and that he duly insured the said furs and that two several Bills of Exchange for seventeen hundred and fifty pounds each drawn by him at four months after sight on C.M. Lampson & Co. of London aforesaid were in accordance with a letter of credit issued by the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at the request of the said C. M. Lampson & Co. by means of which said false pretences the said Charles Emil Leopold unlawfully caused and procured the further sum of thirty-four thousand one hundred and eleven yen and sixty four sen of the moneys of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to be paid and transferred to the Bank account of him the said Charles Emil Leopold with the said Honging Corporation for his use and benefit with intent to defraud. And that he did thereby obtain from the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation the said sum of thirty four thousand one hundred and eleven yen and sixty-four sen with intent to defraud whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern the before mentioned sixteen packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 9 8) 150/165 or the aforesaid four cases of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 98) 196/169, or the aforesaid ten packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 98) 115/194 or the aforesaid nine packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 98) 195/203 or the said ten packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 98) 204/213 or any of them or any port of them and whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not duly insured the aforesaid furs or any of them and whereas in truth and in fact the aforesaid bills of exchange in this count mentioned were not nor were any of them drawn by the said Charles Emil Leopold on C. M. Lampson & Co. in accordance with the letter of credit issued by the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at request of the said C. M. Lampson & Co. as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the respective times and time when he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the Statute in such case made and provided and against the peace of Our Lady the Queen Her Crown and dignity.

SEVENTH COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown prosecutor for Our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that the said Charles Emil Leopold at Yokohama aforesaid afterwards that is to say on the said ninth day of February in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety eight unlawfully, knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis by writing a certain letter dated said ninth day of February and addressed to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at Yokohama aforesaid that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern sixteen packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 98) 150/165 to be carried from Yokohama to London and there to be delivered to C. M. Lampson and Co, or their order and that he duly caused the said furs to be insured against the perils of the seas and that a bill of exchange for two thousand and eight hundred and seventy-five pound sterling the value as alleged by him the said Charles Emil Leopold of the furs aforesaid was drawn by him according to the conditions of a letter of credit issued by the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at the request of the said C. M. Lampson and Co. by means of which false pretences the said Charles Emil Leopold unlawfully caused and procured the sum of twenty eight thousand yen of the moneys of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to be paid to the Russo-Chinese Bank at Yokohama a Banking Company of which Messrs. Browne and Company were then the agents at Yokohama for and on account of him the said Charles Emil Leopold and for his use and benefit with intent to defraud and that he did thereby obtain from the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation the said sum of twenty-eight thousand yen with intent to defraud, whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship the sixteen packages of furs aforesaid or any of them, and whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not caused to be insured the said sixteen packages of furs or any of the said furs, and whereas in truth and in fact the said bill of exchange for two thousand eight hundred and seventy-five pounds sterling was not drawn in accordance with the said letter of credit issued at the request of C. M. Lampson and Co. as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the Statute in such case made and provided and against the peace of Our Lady the Queen her Crown and Dignity.

EIGHTH COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor in Japan Our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that afterwards on the said nineteenth day of February in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight at Yokohama aforesaid the said Charles Emil Leopold unlawfully, knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend by writing a letter dated the said nineteenth day of February and addressed to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation stating therein that he did send therewith to the said Banking Banking Corporation complete bill of lading, policy in duplicate and invoices for ten packages of furs marked and numbered (L I in a diamond above 9 8) 185/194 shipped by the said steamship Hohenzollern at Yokohama for London vid Suez Canal and that a certain bill of exchange for eleven hundred and twenty-five pounds sterling and another bill of exchange for eight hundred and seventy-five pounds sterling referred to and enclosed in the said letter and drawn by him against the said good were in accordance with the said C. M. Lampson & Co.'s credit, that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the said German steamship Hohenzollern ten packages of furs to be carried from Yokohama to London and had caused the said furs to be insured against loss by perils of the seas and that a bill of exchange for eleven hundred and twenty five pounds sterling, another bill of exchange for eight hundred and seventy-five pounds sterling drawn by him the said Charles Emil Leopold were and each of them was drawn in accordance with a credit issued at the request of the said firm of C. M. Lampson & Co. by means of which said false pretences he the said Charles Emil Leopold did then unlawfully induce the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation to purchase and the Bills of Exchange aforesaid and out of the proceeds thereof did unlawfully cause and procure to be paid to the said Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China at Yokohama aforesaid eleven thousand yen of the moneys of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation for and on account of him the said Charles Emil Leopold for his use and benefit with intent to defraud and that he did thereby obtain from the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation the said sum of eleven thousand yen with intent to defraud whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship Hohenzollern the said ten packages of furs or any of them. And whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not caused to be insured the said ten packages of furs or any of them, and whereas in truth and in fact the said bills of exchange for eleven hundred and twenty-five pounds and eight hundred and seventy-five pounds were not nor was either of them in accordance with the said C. Leopold afterwards on the tenth day of January in the year aforesaid unlawfully knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis the Manager of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at Yokohama aforesaid that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the aforesaid steamship Hohenzollern ten bales of furs marked and numbered L.I in a diamond above 98 (96/105 of the alleged value of seven hundred and fifty pounds and that he had duly caused the said furs to be insured against the perils of the seas on the voyage from Yokohama to London by means of which false pretences he induced the said Herbert Maurice Bevi's to purchase with the moneys of the said Banking Corporation a bill of exchange for seven hundred and fifty pounds drawn by him the said Charles Emil Leopold on C. M. Lampson & Co. of London, payable at four months after sight and thereby incurred a liability to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in the sum of seven thousand three hundred and nine yen and sixty five sen for which said sum he then obtained credit with the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not at the time of incurring the said liability or at any other time shipped the said ten cases of furs or any part of them, and whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not caused to be insured against the perils of the seas the said furs or any of them as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the Statute in such case made and provided and against the Peace of Our Lady the Queen Her Crown and Dignity.

TENTH COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor in Japan for Our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that the said Charles Emil Leopold at Yokohama aforesaid afterwards on the said ninth day of February in the year aforesaid unlawfully knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis the Manager of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the said steam ship Hohenzollern sixteen packages of furs marked and numbered (L.I in a diamond above 98) 150/165 of the alleged value of two thousand eight hundred and seventy five pounds sterling and had duly caused the said furs to be insured against the perils of the seas on the voyage from Yokohama to London by means of which false pretence he induced the said Herbert Maurice Bevis to purchase with the moneys of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation a bill of exchange for two thousand eight hundred and seventy five pounds sterling drawn by the said Charles Emil Leopold on C. M. Lampson & Co. of London and thereby he the said Charles Emil Leopold incurred a liability to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in the sum of twenty right thousand and ninety one yen and sixty one sen for which said sum he then obtained credit with the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not at the time of incurring the said liability or at any other time shipped the said sixteen packages of furs or any of them and whereas in truth and in fact he had not caused to be insured the said sixteen packages of furs or any of them against the perils of the seas as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the Statute in such case made and provided and against the Peace of Our Lady the Queen Her Crown and Dignity.

ELEVENTH COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor in Japan for our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that the said Charles Emil Leopold afterwards at Yokohama aforesaid on the said nineteenth day of February in the year aforesaid did unlawfully designedly and knowingly falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the said German steamship Hohenzollern ten packages of furs marked and numbered (L.I in diamond above 98) 185/194 of the alleged value of two thousand pounds sterling and that he had caused the said furs to be insured against loss by perils of the seas by means of which false pretences he the said Charles Emil Leopold induced the said Herbert Maurice Bevis to purchase a bill of exchange for eleven hundred and twenty five pounds sterling drawn by him the said Charles Emil Leopold on Messrs. C. M. Lampson & Co. London and another Bill of Exchange for eight hundred and seventy five pounds sterling drawn by him the said Charles Emil Leopold on C. M. Lampson & Co. aforesaid and payable four months after sight and thereby incurred a liability to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in the sum of nineteen thousand four hundred and thirty-one yen and ninety nine sen for which sum aforesaid he then obtained credit with the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship the said ten packages of furs or any of them or any part of them and whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not caused to be insured against loss by the perils of the seas the said furs or any of them as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the Statute in such case made and provided and against the Peace of Our Lady the Queen Her Crown and Dignity.

TWELFTH COUNT:—And Henry Charles Litchfield as Crown Prosecutor in Japan for Our Lady the Queen as aforesaid doth further present and charge that the said Charles Emil Leopold afterwards at Yokohama aforesaid on the seventh day of April one thousand eight hundred and ninety eight unlawfully knowingly and designedly did falsely pretend to the said Herbert Maurice Bevis the Manager of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation that he the said Charles Emil Leopold had shipped on board the German steamship Hohenzollern nine packages of furs of the value as alleged by him of seventeen hundred and fifty pounds sterling to be carried from Yokohama to London and there delivered to the order of him the said CharlesEmil Leopold and also that he had shipped on board the aforesaid steamship Hohenzollern ten other packages of furs of the value as alleged by him of seventeen hundred and fifty pounds sterling to be carried from Yokohama to London and there delivered to the order of him the said Charles Emil Leopold and that the said furs had been duly insured against loss by perils of the sea during the voyage aforesaid by means of which false pretences he the said Charles Emil Leopold did then unlawfully induce the said Herbert Maurice Bevis to purchase with the moneys of the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation two bills of Exchange for seventeen hundred and fifty pounds sterling each drawn by him the said Charles Emil Leopold on C. M. Lampson & Co., London, payable four months after sight and thereby incurred a liability to the said Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation in the sum of thirty-four thousand one hundred and eleven yen and sixty-four sen, for which said sum he then obtained credit with the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship the said nine packages of furs or any of them, and whereas in truth and in fact the said Charles Emil Leopold had not shipped on board the said steamship the said ten packages of furs or any of them, and whereas in truth and in fact he the said Charles Emil Leopold had not caused to be insured against loss by the perils of the seas the said nine packages of furs or the said ten packages of furs or any of them as he the said Charles Emil Leopold well knew at the time he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid against the form of the Statute in such case made and provided and against the Peace of our Lady the Queen Her Crown and Dignity.

(Signed) HENRY CHARLES LITCHFIELD,
Crown Prosecutor.

Dated at Yokohama in the district of Kanagawa this Eleventh day of November in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety eight.

Prisoner, on being asked to plead, replied "Not guilty."

SWEARING THE JURY.

The swearing-in of the Jury was then proceeded with.

The following were called :—C. K. M. Martin, G. Charlesworth, A. J. Lines, H. Rose, J. Stewart, F. H. Hooper, S. Strauss, H. V. Henson, T. Abbey, E. C. Davis, W. Walker, J. B. Coulson, H. Bent, T. W. McIlraith, H. Baldin, G. Watt, and G. Steeny.

Medical certificates were sent in in the cases of Messrs. Rose, Hooper, and McIlraith, and they were excused. Fines of $50 each were inflicted in the cases of Messrs. Stewart, Charlesworth, Henson, Coulson, and Bent, who did not answer to their names.

Mr. Lines, on being called, asked to be excused on the ground that he suffered from sciatica, headache, and a very strong prejudice against the accused—(laughter).

Mr. Terry—I think he had better stand aside for the present.

The Judge—You may stand aside.

Mr. Watt was called, and went submissively into the box but after some hesitation Mr. Litchfield rose, and, observing that the proposed Juror was deaf, suggested that he should stand aside.

The Judge concurred.

Addressing Mr. Terry, His Honour asked him if he wished to challenge any of the Jurors. He said the Crown was entitled to the last word with regard to Jurors standing aside, but if there was any whom Mr. Terry objected to he might show cause against him.

Mr. Terry—Have I the right now to put a question to the Jurymen to find out whether there is any cause why they should not serve?

The Judge—No, you cannot hold an inquisition. You challenge any man, and examine him with a view to show cause.

Mr. Terry—I have no right to put questions?

His Honour—Not fishing questions, no.

Mr. Terry—That is, I have no right to challenge unless I know, and cannot put questions to ascertain?

His Honour—No.

Mr. Terry—I wanted to know what is the practice. Our practice is different.

The Jury were finally sworn in as follows:—Messrs Martin, Abbey, Walker, Baldin, and Steeney.

COUNSEL'S OPENING.

Mr. Litchfield then rose to open the case for the prosecution. He said the indictment was of considerable length, but that was rendered necessary by the circumstances of the transactions in which the accused had been engaged. The indictment as a whole charged the accused with the offence technically known as obtaining money under false pretences, and alleged that that money had been obtained from the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation at various times, in the first instance on the 31st December last year, and in the last instance on the 7th April of this year. There were also a set of counts against the accused of incurring a liability to the bank and obtaining credit from the bank on false pretences. There was also another specific charge against him in the fourth count of the indictment which he (Mr. Litchfield) would treat separately from the others—that of inducing one of the partners of Ahrens and Co. to issue documents for the purpose of being used as a valuable security by means of false pretences. Throughout all these transactions the false pretences made use of were practically the same. They differed only in dates and amounts, so that it would be most convenient to make the Jury understand the real purport of the charge before going into specific details. It might be well to explain who the accused was at the time these offences were alleged to be committed; what he did at that time, and what he (Mr. Litchfield) should have to ask them to infer as to the reasons of his action. Leopold on the 31st December, 1897, and prior to that time was a clerk in the employ of Ahrens & Co., Nachf. a firm of German merchants in Yokohama, who in addition to their ordinary business acted as agents for the German steamship company the Norddeutscher Lloyd and for the London Insurance Company, which occasionally issued policies of marine insurance. The accused was manager of the shipping department of the office, and under him was a German named Hannssen. Among the duties of these two men, and chiefly of the accused, was that of seeing that bills of lading for cargo carried on board the steamers of the Norddeutscher Lloyd were made in due form and according to the rules of the office. When prepared in proper form they were laid before one of the partners of the firm, whomever might be in charge, for his signature. He (Mr. Litchfield) would be able to show them that one of the partners, Mr. A. Hoffmann, who was in charge on the 31st December, was in the habit of attaching the firm's signature as a matter of course to the bills of lading presented to him coming from the shipping department. They (the gentlemen of the Jury) could quite understand from their experience of business that considering the number of bills of lading presented prior to the departure of a steamer it would be almost impossible for the partner to read over every bill laid before him or even to enquire what the particulars of the cargo to which it related were, or in fact to do more than take it for granted that the man who was chief of the department had done his duty and that the bill was in order. He submitted that the accused at that time had been in the employ of Ahrens & Co. for many years, and that great confidence was reposed in him. In consequence of that trust his opportunities were all the greater in the event of his being tempted to betray his employers, and he (Mr. Litchfield) had to submit that he did betray them. Some time prior to the 31st December accused laid before or caused to be sent in from the shipping office to the partners' office a bill of lading for the signature of the firm which purported to state that he had shipped on board the Hohenzollern 10 cases of furs of the value of £1250 and also 40 bales of the alleged value of £3,000 to be taken to London. About the same time he procured as manager of the insurance business of the firm the firm's signature to an insurance policy purporting to be issued on the 10 cases and 40 bales mentioned in the bill of lading. With these documents in his possession he wrote to the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank a letter enclosing the documents and asking to be credited in the bank's books for the equivalent in yen of the sterling value of the two alleged shipments in accordance with a credit telegraphed by a London firm, Messrs. Lampson and Co. Leopold had been for some time shipping goods to London on his own account, and had been advised by the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank that they were authorised to purchase his bills drawn on London for the value of furs at certain rates, provided that the documents relating to these furs were given to the bank as security, that security constituting what was called documentary bills. On the security of the bills of lading presented by Leopold on December 31st the bank purchased the bills, and it was this and other transactions which gave rise to the present charge. He (Mr. Litchfield) would be able to show them by negative proof that at that time Leopold had not shipped on the Hohenzollern or taken any steps to ship either 10 cases or 40 bales of furs, and further that from that time to the 7th April, 1898, he had not shipped any furs bearing the marks and numbers of these particular shipments, that though he had not shipped any furs he still went on obtaining bills of lading on dates specified in the indictment, and that it was these bills of lading which induced the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank to purchase his bills of exchange on Lampson and Co. The evidence he would have to lay before them as negative proof of non-shipment would be the practice in vogue in the shipment of goods and the signing of bills of lading. Some time ago Yokohama procured the advantage of a pier in the Harbour, and for the purpose of transacting the business of shipping cargo there was formed a company which carried on business as the Pier Traffic and Lighter Company. This Company acted as the agents of Ahrens and Co. in delivering cargo intended to be shipped on board the Norddeutscher Lloyd steamers. The intending shipper made application to Ahrens and Co. and received from the shipping office a form in duplicate on blue paper on which he had to fill in the particulars of the cargo. At the same time he received from the shipping office a set of bills of lading. The blue forms were filled in at the office and the particulars given by the shipper were entered into the counterfoil, and duplicate blue forms were filled in corresponding to the counterfoil, and were given to the shipper with the forms of the bill of lading. The intending shipper took these two forms to the office of the Pier Company and if he took the cargo with him he was given a receipt on one of the company's forms, which practically rated as what before the establishment of the Pier Company would have been called the mate's receipt acknowledging the delivery of the goods. The shipper got one of these forms, and when he asked for his bill of lading to be signed he brought back this blue form to Ahrens & Co. His bill of lading was then compared with the particulars stated on the blue form, the blue form receipt was filed, and the set of bills of lading were sent through the shipping office to the partners' office for the signature of the firm. There was another check upon the shipper and the Pier Company. The latter was supplied with a book of forms of white paper in counterfoil and duplicate. Two forms were filled in by the Pier Company in accordance with the particulars on the blue forms and were sent with the cargo to the Hohenzollern, and if the cargo was properly received by the Hohenzollern the second officer signed one copy of these white forms and gave it to the Pier Company as a receipt. The second copy of the white forms was afterwards sent to Ahrens and Co. He wished them to notice that as the blue form receipt was looked on as what was called the mate's receipt the bills of lading were made out from that and signed before the departure of the Hohenzollern. After the departure the white receipts came in and they were a further check. In the meantime the shipping department had made out the manifest of cargo. That manifest was made out in the first instance from the bills of lading, the copy of which was retained in the shipping office. The manifest was made out from that, and after the departure of the steamship was again checked by the white forms. He should show the Jury that the signatures of the bills of lading which formed the subject of these indictments were obtained by Leopold without any corresponding entries at the office of the Pier Company, so that the mate of the Hohenzollern saw no manifest, and he should also be in a position to state that the cargo represented by the bills of lading could not have been received and was not received on board the Hohenzollern, as represented and purported to be by these bills of lading that Leopold had obtained. This was a general view of the facts of the case. It now remained for him to go into the separate counts in detail.

At this point the Judge suggested that it would be a convenient moment to adjourn. Addressing the Jury he observed that he was glad to tell them that there was no necessity to detain them, but it was their duty, if they were allowed to go freely, not to talk concerning the case to any one except among themselves, and he charged them to observe that injunction.

The Court then adjourned till two o'clock.

On the Court reassembling Mr. Litchfield said he would proceed to explain as clearly as he could the points likely to be at issue between the Crown and the accused on the evidence he proposed to submit. The offence of false pretences was defined by the Larceny Act, and that case came under the section which provided that any person who by false pretence obtained for any purpose any valuable security with intent to defraud was guilty of a misdemeanour, and of another section which laid down that any person attempting to secure money with attempt to defraud should be deemed to have obtained such money within the meaning of the Act. Mr. Litchfield then went through the indictment count by count, impressing on the Jury the facts and points of law referring to each. He dwelt among other things on the conversations Leopold had in April at the Hospital with Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Harmssen and his letters to Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Wismer. The effect of these was that Leopold was quite aware that these goods had not gone forward. Their evidence would also substantiate the fact that Leopold had urged Ahrens and Co. to make certain representations by telegram to their principals to account for the fact that these furs had not gone forward. The Jury could remove from their minds any difficulty as to coming to a conclusion whether these furs were or were not sent forward. The question to which they would have to devote their attention and possibly also the main question which they would be asked by his learned friend to consider would be the question whether or not these transactions were carried through by Leopold with the intention of defrauding anybody. He should ask them as reasonable men of the world and as men of business what could be those intentions. A man's intentions must be judged by his acts. They could not pry into his secret thoughts; they could only judge by the results. He confidently submitted to them that Leopold by virtue of his position got signatures of bills of lading which had not passed through the usual form, and had falsely represented that certain furs had been shipped to London, and induced the Bank to buy his bills on the strength of that. Lampson's credit was only given on the condition that the furs were properly shipped, and he (Mr. Litchfield) submitted that Leopold improperly obtained money from the bank, and asked them to infer from that he had fraudulent intent. It was not a question whether Leopold had some idea of repaying the money at a subsequent time if he was able to do so. The question was—did he wrongfully and unlawfully induce the bank to part with their money even for a day, even for an hour? If they were satisfied that these bills of lading were fraudulent he should ask them to find the accused guilty. Having pointed out that the fourth count came under the 30th section of the same Act, and that the fifth count was under the Debtors' Act, Mr. Litchfield went on to remark that what were called the Captain's copies of the bills of lading were retained by Leopold, and pointed out that if they had been brought to notice on the 31st December and on subsequent dates the goods to which they referred would not have been included in the manifest of the Hohenzollern. He asked them to draw their own inferences from the fact. He then proceeded to a general review of the evidence he intended to call, and, alluding to the fact that the liabilities with regard to part of the bills in question had been met by Ahrens & Co., pointed out that that company no doubt argued that the ultimate responsibility lay with them, and that they might as well make up the loss at once as later; and also that they might have had another reason—the desire not to alienate two influential companies of whom they were the agents. He observed that it might be said that what Leopold had done was a slip. "Well," said Mr. Litchfield, "we are all liable to err. I make mistakes myself occasionally. If it is only once we may hope to be excused. But where you find exactly the same mistake on four or five occasions, perhaps six occasions, always for the benefit of the accused and by means of which perhaps he obtained money and obtained benefits for himself I must ask you to enquire whether it is carelessness or whether it is, if not fraud, at least a deliberate attempt to defraud."

EVIDENCE.

Evidence was then called.

Henry William Fraser, in the employ of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, said:—I am the clerk in charge of the outward bill business of the Bank. I was in charge of that department on 31st December, 1897, and I am still in charge of that department. I know the accused. He was a constituent of the Bank previous to December 31st, 1897. He was well known to me. He had been a constituent of the bank, I think, all the time I have been in Yokohama, just over three years. I know he had a credit with the bank opened by Messrs. Lampson & Co., London, to draw bills of exchange with documents attached against furs. This document (produced) bears my initials.

Mr. Litchfield—It is a letter from the Hongkong Bank to Mr. Leopold dated February 8th. (Exhibit J. This was a letter from the Hongkong Bank stating that Messrs. Lampson & Co. had opened a credit with them on Leopold's behalf to the extent of £5,000).

Witness—That was the credit I mentioned. That was a renewal of former credits. On the back of this letter are the amounts of the bills negotiated under the credit. The letter was sent to Mr. Leopold, and sent back with the bills noted on the back by Mr. Leopold.

The endorsement on the back was read by Mr. Litchfield as follows:—

Negotiated.

Date 1898.	£
February 9th	2,875
" 14th	1,000
" 21st	1,125
	5,000
February 24th	875
April 7th	1,750
"	1,750

In explanation of this the witness said:—There are three sums which, added, make £5,000 Then there are three other amounts not added up. There is a note on the back, which explains this. "Wire 22/2/98 makes this credit £10,000" A wire extending the credit to that sum was received on Feb. 22nd. This note was placed on the back of the letter by me on receipt of the wire from our London office giving us that information. After that note the letter came into Mr. Leopold's possession again. He was aware of the credit being increased. I know of the existence of letters verifying credits possessed by accused previous to the 31st December. The letter produced (Exhibit A) is signed E. Leopold. It was received by the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank here.

Mr. Litchfield here read the letter contained in the sixth count of the indictment.

Witness—The pencil marks on this letter were made by me when the document was received. The marks are 33 over 6,388. That is the number of the bill in our books. The letter was accompanied by invoices, bills of lading, and a policy of insurance. I identify the signatures on the bills of lading (referring to shipments of furs) produced as those of E. Leopold. I identify the signatures on the insurance policies produced. They are those of E. Leopold.

The witness was then shown a number of exhibits consisting of letters, bills of lading, and insurance policies, to which he identified the signatures as those of E. Leopold. The amounts for which the bills were bought by the bank were, he said, placed to the credit of the current account of the accused. This was in accordance with his request. Witness passed the entries himself. They were journal entries. The bank's own account was debited with the same amounts.

Mr. Litchfield—As between the bank and the constituents what would you describe the effect of those entries?

Mr. Terry—I object; the effect of ordinary entries is a matter of common knowledge for the Jury, and not a matter of opinion from a witness. It is a matter of opinion about a fact which cannot be proved in that way.

His ■ nour gravely took note of the objection but allowed the question.

The witness was then asked the question, and replied that the effect would be that Mr. Leopold would have the number of yen stated placed to his account.

His Honour—That doesn't give us much information—(laughter).

At this point the Court adjourned till ten o'clock this morning.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 7TH, 1898.

RESUMED HEARING.

The hearing of the Leopold case was resumed on Wednesday morning. The attendance in Court was smaller than on the opening day, and was practically restricted to persons directly interested in the case. Counsel appeared as on the opening day; Mr. Litchfield and Mr. Lowder for the Crown; Professor Terry for the defence; and Mr. Walford for the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

The Judge, immediately after taking his seat, said to Mr. Litchfield—Yesterday you put a question to Mr. Fraser to show that the credits previous to the credit of which we have got a copy were in the same words. Do you propose to put in those previous credits? If you have them I suppose you will. If you have not it will be necessary of course to show what has become of them, because I take it you cannot give secondary evidence of them if they are in existence and procurable.

Mr. Lowder (after consultation with Mr. Litchfield)—They are in the hands of the other side and we have called for them. They have not been produced and if they are not produced we shall have to give secondary evidence as to their contents.

His Honour—It is desirable that that should be done as soon as possible.

Mr. Lowder—Quite so, I will formally ask the counsel for the other side whether he produces the letters advising accused of the credit of the 15th December, 1897, and the 4th of January, 1898.

Mr. Terry—We have sent for them. I do not know whether we can get them, but I have not made any objection and shall not make any objection as to any secondary evidence as to their contents. I have no doubt whatever they were all in the same terms.

His Honour—Yes. But in a case of this sort I cannot even accept your admission, though it facilitates matters.

Mr. Terry—I don't know what the rule of this Court is in the matter.

Mr. Lowder—Then we want evidence as to the credits of the 15th December, 1897, and the 4th January, 1898. I might add to these the 19th February and the 28th February, 1898.

His Honour—The same remarks apply to these.

Mr. Terry—I am quite willing that these should go in evidence.

Mr. Lowder—The first letter is March 29th, 1887. That is as far as we can go back. We have called for all these.

His Honour—I am ready to take secondary evidence as to these matters if it is convenient to take it at this stage.

Mr. Litchfield—Mr. Fraser, you told us yesterday that Mr. Leopold had previous credits; have you written to him advising him of them?—Yes.

Among other advices did you write him on the 4th January, 1898, on the subject.—Yes.

Was the letter sent to Leopold?—Yes.

Have you sent for the originals?—Yes.

They are not in the bank?—No.

His Honour (handing a legal book)—Put these formal questions here, Mr. Litchfield.

Witness was then shown a copy of the letter, and recognised it as an accurate transcript taken on the date of the letter. A press copy was taken at the time and was now in the press copy-book at the bank.

The copy of the letter of the 4th January, 1898, was then read. It was to the effect that the bank had been advised to purchase Leopold's bills at 4 months on C. M. Lampson and Co. to the extent of £5,000, for value of skins shipped, the bills to be accompanied by invoices, bills of lading, &c. The letter advised him that this was not to be regarded as a bank credit and did not absolve him from the liability attaching to the drawer of a bill of exchange. In the margin of the letter was this note: "N.B. This is a renewal of our London credit 33/45 advised by wire 29th March, 97. Of the limits with regard to the purchase of skins you have already been advised."

The letter, the witness said, consisted partly of a printed form and partly of writing. The copy put in was an accurate transcript of the copy in the Bank press letter book of the original letter.

The Judge—I am afraid I can't take secondary evidence of secondary evidence. I think you had better get the press copy book itself.

The witness left the Court for the purpose.

On his return he compared the copy with the one in the press letter book and stated that it was an accurate copy. The letter of credit would be sent to the bank with the bills sent in by accused. The bills negotiated were endorsed on it. He had no doubt, that that was done in this case. This credit was exhausted by bills sent in. They were December 31st, 1897, £1,250; same date £3,000; Jan. 10th, 1898, £750. Entries to that amount would in the ordinary course be made on the back of the letter of credit. He was aware that the letter was dated Jan. 4th, 1897, but that two bills were negotiated on December 31st. Witness thought that was a mistake of the clerk who made a copy of the endorsement.

The Judge—Would you like to look it up again and see what were the real sums against that credit and those against other credits?

Witness—Yes, from another book at the bank.

His Honour suggested that if Mr. Litchfield was going to prove other credits he should say so, and give the witness the opportunity of putting himself in a position to trace them at the same time.

Mr. Lowder undertook to give the witness a note of all that had to be proved, and to give him an opportunity of looking them up.

The examination as to documents was then resumed.

Witness was shown another exhibit of the date of January 10th, 1898, consisting of a letter, bill of lading, invoices, and insurance policy. He identified the signature as that of Leopold.

His Honour—By whom was it received?

Witness—The Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation.

His Honour—No, it was not. The Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation can't read a letter. By what person was it received?

Witness—The accountant.

The letter was read. It had reference to ten bales of furs alleged to be shipped on the Hohenzollern on January 10th. On the letter was a note, "Credit c a 10/1/98." This was to show that accused had been credited with the equivalent in yen to the sterling value of his bill.

The bill of lading was then read in detail.

Witness next identified the signatures on letter and documents of 9th February, referring to 16 packages of furs. The date of the letter was 9th February, but credit was not given for the amount (£2,875) till 14th February. He did not remember why that was, but it was probably only because some of the documents were not in order.

The letter and documents of the 15th February, 1898, were then handed to witness, and he replied in similar terms. The same procedure was adopted with regard to the documents of the 19th Feb. On the latter date witness wrote a letter as follows to Leopold:—

> Dear Sir,—With reference to your draft on C. M. Lampson & Co. for £2,000 please note that it overdraws your credit by £875. We have therefore asked the Chartered Bank to present again on Monday your cheque for 15,900 yen, when we hope you will have arranged the credit to put all in order.

The draft of £875 was afterwards accepted in consequence of a telegram from the London office of the Bank instructing the Yokohama manager to extend the credit to £10,000.

The documents of the 7th April were then put in, and witness identified the signatures.

The Court then adjourned for tiffin.

Mr. Fraser, re-examined, said it was on a general authority that he dealt with the bills of exchange in the manner he had spoken of. He meant on general instructions from the Manager of the Bank.

Showing the witness the set of documents marked A (a letter, bill of lading, invoice, and insurance policy) Mr. Litchfield asked him what he considered the representation made by them was intended to mean.

Mr. Terry objected.

The Judge—On what grounds?

Mr. Terry—In the first place, that the opinion of the witness as to the meaning of representations the words of which have been proved to the Jury is not proper evidence. The second objection is that the fact itself is not a proper fact to be proved at all. Mr. Terry went on to quote cases to show that a prisoner could not be held liable for fraud upon a construction of his words other than that which he intended them to bear. The case on which he chiefly relied was that of Delly v. Peate in which the question at issue was a sale of property and a claim was made for misrepresentation. The statement complained of was made in a written document which was capable of bearing two constructions. It was proved that the seller intended it to bear one meaning, in which sense it was true, and the buyer understood it to have a different meaning, in which sense it was false. The Court of Appeal undertook to decide which was the true meaning and decided that the meaning in which the words were false was the true one, but the House of Lords reversed this decision, holding that the only meaning that could be attached to the words was that which the defendant himself attached to it. The question as to what this witness thought of the representations made was wholly irrelevant. There were only two meanings which were of value—the meaning Mr. Leopold himself attached to the representation and the meaning which Mr. Bevis, the Bank manager, attached to them.

Mr. Litchfield—I think there is some misapprehension. I did not mean to ask what opinion he forms now, but what opinion he formed at the time.

Mr. Terry—I shall made the same objection. I shall object to any statement except Mr. Leopold's and Mr. Bevis's. What any one else understood is not of any importance.

The Judge—This bill of lading is signed by Ahrens and Co., and the statements made in it

Mr. Terry—I say that nobody's understanding is of any importance except that of Mr. Leopold and Mr. Bevis. There are only two meanings—the meaning of the man who made the representations, and that of the man who acted on it.

The Judge—You cannot pretend that that bill of lading, signed by Ahrens and Co., means anything but that the furs have been shipped.

Mr. Terry—I don't admit that.

The Judge—That is what I shall tell the Jury is their meaning.

Mr. Terry—If your Honour decides that——

The Judge—I do not say that I shall say that there was fraudulent intent.

His Honour—Unless there is evidence to the contrary the bill of lading showing that goods have been shipped leads to the inference that they have been shipped.

Mr. Terry—The opinion of this witness, I submit, is not proper evidence.

His Honour said the question was that Mr. Fraser received these documents and acted upon them, and what was his belief at the time he did so?

Mr. Terry said what Mr. Bevis understood was proper evidence, but not what his subordinate understood. What impression was made by the documents on Mr. Bevis's mind could be proved, and he should not object, but the opinion of this witness was of no importance in the case, as they had it at the preliminary hearing that the instructions as to buying these bills came from Mr. Bevis.

Mr. Litchfield quoted cases in reply to the objection, and submitted that Mr. Fraser was the authorised and intelligent agent of the bank, and that the question as to what effect these representations had upon him was legitimate.

Mr. Terry—I did not suppose that the prosecution would take the ground that Mr. Fraser was responsible for these transactions. At the preliminary hearing it was stated that Mr. Bevis was responsible for the instructions concerning them. If the question had been put to Mr. Bevis I should not have objected to it.

His Honour (to Mr. Litchfield)—Mr. Terry's objection is that your case covers any representation made to Mr. Bevis, but does not cover any representation made to Mr. Fraser.

After some further discussion it was suggested that the question "What were your duties with regard to these bills" might be put, and this was done.

Witness—I should pass the bills if the documents appeared to be in order without reference to the management.

Mr. Litchfield—Supposing any of the documents, say a bill of lading, had been missing at the time what would your duty be with regard to the purchase or otherwise of the bill of exchange?

Witness—I should have rejected it.

Mr. Litchfield (to the Judge)—Now I ask you to allow me to repeat my first question.

His Honour (after a pause)—Now, Mr. Fraser I am going to put you a question myself. Was it your duty to form an opinion upon what was meant by the document itself?

Mr. Terry—I object.

His Honour—That can meet with no objection. It will be time for you when we get the answer.

Witness—Yes, it was.

His Honour—If you had any reason to believe that the facts were other than stated in the documents would you have acted as you did?

Witness—No, certainly not.

His Honour—Do you still object to the question, Mr. Terry?

Mr. Terry—I persist in my objection, but I will not waste your Honour's time in arguing on it further.

The question was then put in this form "Did you infer from these documents that the furs had been shipped?"

Witness—Yes.

Original from UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

Had you any reason whatever to believe that they might not have been shipped?—No.

The same questions were asked with regard to other exhibits, and for the convenience of the Court the witness was told to stand aside to await cross-examination, and re-examination on the points reserved early in the morning, till to-day.

Albert Hoffman, a German subject, said he was residing for the present in Kobe. On the 31st December last he was residing in Yokohama, and previous to that he had lived in Yokohama for about 12 years. He was one of the partners in Ahrens ■ Co., Nachf. He left Yokohama for Kobe about January 20th, 1898. He knew the accused. He was in the employ of Ahrens & Co. in December last. He had been in that employment since 1886, when witness arrived in Japan. The firm of Ahrens and Co. were engaged in the import business and they were also agents of the N.D. Lloyd and the London Assurance Company. The accused was the manager of the shipping and insurance department. He had the control of the whole work. The steamer of the N. D. Lloyd from Yokohama to Hongkong was the Hohenzollern, and cargo shipped by her would be transferred at Hongkong to another steamer. Ahrens & Co. signed bills of lading for cargo as agents for the N.D.L. Company. The witness identified his signature on various bills of lading produced. He did not remember signing them. The rule was that the bills of lading were examined in the shipping office, and, if found correct, brought to the private office for signature. The partners presumed that everything was in order when they were brought in from the shipping department. Mr. Leopold was chief of the shipping department, and they had every confidence in him. Witness identified his signature on policies of insurance. He did not examine these before signing them. Witness went to Kobe about the 20th of January and paid a visit to Yokohama at the end of April. He went to see accused, who was in the German Hospital. At that time his firm had received a telegram from Bremen, from the Nord. Lloyd. He communicated the contents of the telegram to accused. The telegram came in code. Witness had conversations with Leopold on the subject of the telegram. On the first occasion there was no other person present. Witness informed accused of the contents of the telegram. He requested an explanation about a certain number of packages of furs, which should have gone forward per Hohenzollern in December or January, but which had not arrived. Accused admitted that he had not shipped the goods. Witness asked him why he had placed the firm in such an awkward position, but he could not get a satisfactory explanation. Accused was very sick at the time and conversation was difficult. He gave witness a list of drafts on Lampson and Co. against the supposed shipments, and promised that he would do everything to satisfy the firm of Ahrens and Co., so that they should not lose anything. He handed witness further a list of assets and a letter addressed to Mr. Wismer giving the gist of their conversation. The letter produced was in Leopold's handwriting, and was written, to the other partner in Ahrens and Co., Mr. Wismer. Mr. Leopold wrote it in witness's presence. That was on May 1st.

Mr. Litchfield read the letter, which stated that Leopold's private account would more than cover the overdraft with the Chartered bank.

Witness identified the list of assets produced, which was in Harmssen's handwriting. It was dictated by Leopold in witness's presence. To the best of his recollection it was a correct representation of what Leopold dictated. He had also received the following note from accused:—"Lampson wires must have cash or goods at once. The affair can therefore be arranged O.K. Yours E. Leopold."

Another message afterwards came to him as to a telegraphic reply Leopold suggested should be sent to Lampson and Co. and which he had dictated to Harmssen.

His Honour suggested that it would perhaps be convenient to call Harmssen at this point to speak to these documents, and counsel concurred.

Johann Andreas Harmssen was called, and said with the exception of a few words the message intended by Leopold as a reply to Lampson's was written by him at Leopold's dictation. The words not written by him were "goods were kept back at shippers' request." That was in Leopold's handwriting. The rest of the draft telegram was dictated by Leopold, and was taken down correctly by witness. It was to this effect: "Goods were kept back at shipper's request. Matter arranged between L. & L. goods to be re sold here. Full remittances through Lampson to us. Full particulars go by mail." A second telegram was also taken down by witness at Leopold's dictation. It was to this effect:—"Thanks, have arranged resale. Have remitted £5,000 T.T. Hongkong. Further remittances follow as soon as deliveries are made. Inform Lloyd." The list of Leopold's assets which witness also took down was as follows: Phoenix Saw Mills, yen 80,000; Yoshihama-cho shed and lease, yen 1,000; house and godown in Japanese town, yen 2 500; land in Kanazawa, yen 1100: paper manufactory in Tokyo, yen 4000; (in Mr. Uyeda's name) Yoshida Shinden lands, outlay on loans, yen 37,000 (in Uyeda and Gisa's name). Claim London Assurance, yen 30 000; various unsold stocks in London, yen 30,000; amounts owing to me, yen 3,000; shares, yen 12,000; skins, coal, wood and other goods unsold, yen 36,000; No. 59, furniture, dwelling house and offices yen 3,500; total yen 240,100.

At this point the Court, which had been sitting in semi-darkness for some time, rose for the day.

THURSDAY DEC. 8TH, 1898.

The hearing was resumed on Thursday morning.

On the opening of the Court, the witness Hoffman was recalled. He was shown an exhibit reading as follows:

Goods were kept back by shippers' request. Matter has been arranged between L. and L. Goods will be resold here. Full remittance to Lampson from us. Full explanation goes forward by Mail.

This was the telegram which accused suggested should be sent in answer to the telegram of the N. D. Lloyd. It was not sent, however, as it did not correspond to the facts. The goods referred to were furs. Witness first learned that the furs had not gone forward at the end of April. Before that time he had no knowledge directly or indirectly that they had not gone forward or that they were not going forward. His first intimation was the telegram from the N. D. Lloyd at Bremen. The word "L and L" meant Leopold and Lampson. The telegram, as far as he knew, was not sent at all.

Another exhibit was shown witness reading as follows:

Thanks; have arranged resale. Have remitted £5,000 T. T. Further remittances follow as soon as deliveries are made. Inform Lloyd.

This was a telegram intended to be sent by Leopold himself to Lampson. "Lloyd" meant the Norddeutschen Lloyd.

This closed the examination in chief.

Cross-examined—The firm signed bills of lading as agents of the N. D. Lloyd. Leopold had been engaged for some years in an export business of his own independently of the business of Ahrens and Co. He exported other things besides furs. Witness did not know whether he always shipped goods by the N. D. Lloyd. He did not remember Leopold coming to him at any time with a bill of lading and witness asking him whether the goods were going forward by that particular steamer, and Leopold replying that it was not going by that steamer and perhaps not by the next. He remembered no conversation at all to that effect. He recollected no conversations at all with Leopold with regard to not sending shipments forward. He remembered no conversation with him with regard to the shipments of other goods besides furs. It could perhaps have happened that the ship was so full that goods for which bills of lading had been issued could not be shipped on that voyage, but in such a case the shipper would be informed immediately. He did not remember an occasion on which this had actually happened.

Re-examined by Mr. Lowder—If accused was the shipper of the goods he would himself know whether they had been delayed or had gone forward. If bills of lading and policies of insurance had been issued for goods which could not be sent on immediately they would be cancelled immediately it was found that they could not be shipped. The firm would generally know before the bills of lading were signed.

Mr. Terry put through the Judge a question as to whether it was not a fact that when the witness saw Leopold at the hospital he was so sick that he could do very little talking of any kind.

Witness—Yes, he was very sick and rather deaf. He could hardly hear a word.

His Honour—Do you remember any conversation with accused with regard to shipments of furs prior to your conversation of April last?

Witness—I remember no special conversation.

His Honour put to the witness further questions to elicit whether he would have been satisfied if the goods for which bills of lading were signed in December or January were about to go forward in the month of April. The witness had much difficulty in understanding the question, but finally replied in the negative. He was under the impression that the goods for which he signed bills of lading in December and January were going forward by the steamer about to sail at those dates.

Henry William Fraser was recalled. He said he had, since the previous day, examined the bank's books as to the credits of the accused. The document produced was an extract from the books, which were in the custody of the bank. Witness had examined them personally, and the extract was correct. The extract was from a register of the credits received by the Bank in Yokohama and a note of the drafts drawn against them. Witness read the extract, which gave full particulars of the different credits and the drafts negotiated. Witness admitted that it appeared on the back of the credit of January 4th that two bills had been negotiated on that credit dated before the credit was actually received. The explanation was that when these bills came in Leopold informed them that the credit was en route, but the Bank insisted on his wiring for it. The letter produced was sent to Leopold from the Bank in the ordinary course of business, and he had no reason to suppose that it had not reached him. It was as follows:

Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation,
March 20th, 1897.

Dear Sir,—We are in receipt of a wire from London to the effect that your credit with Lampson and Co., is renewed for same amount, £5,000, same conditions. Yours truly, H. V. Dickinson, accountant.

E. Leopold, Esq.

Another letter was handed in, but the Judge said it stood on a different footing to the last. It was a copy from a general letter from the office of the Bank in London to the Yokohama branch, and did not appear to him to be of much importance. It was doubtful whether it was evidence in the case at all, and he (His Honour) should have to hear counsel on the point.

Mr. Lowder agreed that it would not be proper evidence unless it had been communicated to the prisoner.

His Honour—It does not seem desirable that you should raise a highly technical question.

Mr. Lowder said the paper would be withdrawn.

Witness continued that the credit of January was exhausted by the bills negotiated on 31st December, 1897, £1,250, and £3,000, and January 10th, 1898, £750.

Cross-examined—On December 31st, when draughts for £1,250 and £3,000 were purchased by the Bank, Leopold's account was overdrawn. Witness understood that he had been allowed to overdraw on the faith that he would send in drafts afterwards. He did not know whether the bills of exchange in exhibits A. to H. had been paid by Messrs. Lampson. The time for acceptance had certainly passed, and probably the time for payment. If any of those bills had been dishonoured the Bank would have received advices in the ordinary course of business. The Bank had in point of fact received no such advices. Thus as far as he knew the Bank had lost nothing on the transactions, and as far as he knew there was no reason to suppose that the Bank would lose anything. Leopold only came to the Bank personally with regard to the letter of credit; on the occasions when the bills were bought by the Bank he did not come himself. Witness received the bills and documents accompanying from the compradore of the Bank. They came to the Bank in a chit-book by a messenger. The Yokohama branch of the Bank did a general banking business. He believed the Bank occasionally purchased bills on the strength of the names on them, and apart from any other security, but he could not say positively, as this did not lie within his department. Such transactions, however, lay within the province of ordinary banking business. The documents (produced) were advices from the Bank to the accused advising him of credits from Lampson and Co. and the terms and conditions on which the Bank would buy his bills. They all contained the words "as per list of prices." The Bank sent a list of prices to Leopold which was sent them at the time the credit was opened by Lampson. It meant the amount which might be drawn for each skin of a particular kind—so much for one sable, so much for one marten, and so forth. The letters from Leopold (produced) all contained the words "the amount drawn is in accordance with C. M. Lampson and Co.'s telegraphed credit." Asked if he understood that to mean that the amount drawn for was in accordance with the number and kind of skins mentioned in the respective invoices according to Lampson's list of prices, witness replied that he understood the drafts to be in accordance with the terms of the credit.

Mr. Terry—Did you understand that the amount of the draft was made up according to the number of skins mentioned in the invoice at Lampson's prices?

Witness—Yes.

You have identified the signatures on these documents as Mr. Leopold's. Is the body of the document in any case in Mr. Leopold's writing?—No, only the signature.

Witness, continuing, said the amount for which Mr. Leopold was given credit for bills in the books of the Bank was the price for which the Bank bought his bills. The Bank then became the holder of the bills. If they were repaid the Bank would receive only the sterling equivalent of the amount paid to Leopold in yen. He could not say whether the Bank made a profit on the transaction. The exchange might have varied; it was impossible to say what the Bank would receive in sterling in London. All the bills came into his department at the Bank; he acted under general instructions and under the contracts entered into by the manager. The manager had not given him instructions to receive Leopold's bills up to the amount of his credit; he acted on a broker's contract which the manager had handed over to him. These contracts arranged the exchange and the class of bills. He had the manager's instructions to receive the bills to the amount stated in the contract, and not in the letter of credit. The contract was sent to him first and if the bills presented agreed with the terms of the contract he had instructions that he could purchase them without special reference to the manager. Witness did refer to the manager with regard to the bills of the 7th April, as there were no brokers' contracts with regard to them. Witness first examined them to see that they were in order, and took them in to Mr. Bevis and asked him if he might purchase them. There was then existing a credit with Lampson sufficient to cover them. He should regard a bill for which no goods had been shipped as a bill which Lampson's would not accept or pay. He only knew approximately at what time the steamer sailed. He did not know of the arrangement of shipping goods through the Pier Company. He did not know that the N. D. Lloyd had a practise of receiving goods and giving bills of lading for them even when the steamers were not in port. There was no general clearing house for bank cheques in Yokohama; adjustments were made between the banks themselves. There were other amounts paid into Leopold's account during the period covered by these transactions, but he could not say whether they were substantial amounts or not.

By the Jury—Advices of non-acceptance of bills were notified first by wire and afterwards by letter. No communication was received in the case of Leopold's bills. To the best of his ability he always checked the prices of the skins, and if their total did not correspond with the amount of the draft he should have rejected them. He must explain, however, that the prices of skins varied at different periods and in some cases they accepted Leopold's word where the amounts did not tally with the prices previously prevailing.

By Mr. Lowder—Witness would be satisfied with the date on the bills of lading presented to him, and would compare the date with that of the sailing of the steamer. He meant by his reply to Mr. Terry in cross-examination that he understood that if the bill of lading had not gone forward Lampson's would not pay or accept the bill. If the bills of lading were in order he should take the bill as a good and valid document without further investigation.

Mr. Terry—Is it the general rule in Banks, or is it the peculiar usage of Mr. Fraser's Bank, to be satisfied by the statements in bills of lading that goods have been shipped, or do they go behind the bill of lading and ascertain that they have been shipped?

Witness—It is our custom to take the bill of lading as evidence that the goods have been shipped.

His Honour—Do you refer to Banks generally or to your own Bank?

Witness—I refer to our Bank.

His Honour—Mr. Terry wishes to know if you know the custom of other banks?

Witness—I do not know.

By Mr. Martin (a Jury man)—Witness took it as sufficient evidence of a bill being in order that it bore the signature of the agents of the steamer.

This concluded the examination of the witness, and the Court adjourned for tiffin.

On the Court reassembling Mr. Lowder made application on behalf of Mr. Hoffmann for permission for him to return to Kobe in the evening. This was granted on the condition that he should hold himself at the disposition of the Court if it should require to hear him further.

Fukushima Choichi was examined through the interpretation of Mr. Perfett. He said he was in the employ of Ahrens and Co., and had been so for about five years. He was engaged in the shipping office and had to deal with insurance policies and to do various clerical work in shipping matters. He identified the writing in several of the documents produced as his. He wrote them by the instructions of accused, and after having written them he handed them to accused.

By Mr. Terry—Besides the business of Ahrens and Company accused was engaged in an export business on his own account. Witness helped accused in his export business. Accused had sent goods by other boats besides N.D. Lloyd boats.

Mr. Terry—Does the witness know whether, when Mr. Leopold shipped goods by some other line, he obtained bills of lading given him by the other company that he shipped by, making the goods deliverable by the N.D. Lloyd or deliverable to the N.D. Lloyd?

Witness—They were not in favour of the N D Lloyd; they were his own.

Mr. Terry—Did he endorse them to the N.D. Lloyd?

Witness—They were not endorsed in that way.

Does he know whether they were made out to Ahrens and Co.?—They were not written so.

Suppose Mr. Leopold shipped by the P. and O., say, does he know what Leopold did with the bills of lading he got from that company?—He sent them to the bank.

How does the witness know this?—I wrote them.

Whereabouts did Mr. Leopold keep the captain's copies of the bills of lading?—In the drawer of his writing desk.

Was the drawer locked?—It was not locked.

How did the witness know that Mr. Leopold kept them there?—I was in the habit of seeing them put in there continually by Mr. Leopold.

Since when?—A long time past. I cannot say exactly.

When other people shipped goods did they put them in this same drawer?—No, the Captain's copies in Mr. Leopold's drawer were his own only, they were not other people's.

Where were the other people's kept?—They were kept in a basket of some kind in a drawer of another desk.

If a Captain's copy was found in the office after the ship had sailed would it show that the goods referred to in it had not been shipped by the steamer?—Yes.

Did he, then, understand that Mr. Leopold had bills of lading for goods which had not been shipped?—Yes.

For how long?—I do not know exactly. Perhaps from October last year to April this, when Mr. Leopold was in the hospital.

Did other people in the office have the same knowledge as himself?—Most of the people of the shipping department were aware of the fact.

Did the witness ever speak to Leopold about it?—I have spoken to Leopold.

Did he ever speak to other people in the office about it?—No.

Did any other people in the office speak to the witness about it?—No one.

Did he ever mention the matter to any member of the firm?—No.

Did not Mr. Leopold occasionally take his captain's copies out of the drawer when he shipped the goods to which they corresponded?—Yes.

Did he not sometimes ship goods to which these captain's copies corresponded?—That is so.

Did Leopold sometimes ship goods after the steamer for which the bills of lading were first made out had departed?—That is so.

Did Leopold occasionally give instructions to the witness as to what goods he wanted shipped?—No.

Did Leopold ever send the witness to the drawer for captains' copies?—Mr. Leopold has told me to do so.

When the steamer was about to go was it not usual for this witness to go to Leopold and ask him what goods he wanted to send on to the steamer?—I am not able to say.

As a matter of accommodation has Mr. Leopold issued bills of lading to other shippers before the goods had been put on board?—I cannot say exactly, but probably there were such cases.

Does he know that Leopold, for a long time had been in the habit of getting bills of lading for himself before the goods were shipped, and that in some cases at least he afterwards shipped goods to cover them?—That is so.

And this practice was generally known among the people in the shipping office?—If cases of that kind had happened the rest of the people in the shipping office would know.

Does he know of any case where Mr. Leopold remitted money to London instead of goods which ought to have been shipped.—I don't know anything of the banking transactions.

Does he know anything of any other business in which Mr. Leopold was engaged outside of Ahrens and Co. and outside of his export business?—Yes.

Does he know anything about that?—I am not well aware, but believe that the Phœnix saw mills were Mr. Leopold's.

Does he know whether from the middle of December to the beginning of April there was a considerable rise in the price of the furs in which Leopold was trading?—I do not.

Did he ever ship goods without their going through the Pier Company?—I do not know.

Does he know when Mr. Leopold was sick if Harmssen asked him if he knew where Leopold kept his captain's copies.—He did not.

Did he hand them to Mr. Harmssen?—I did.

After a telegram had been received in regard to missing furs?—That is so.

How came he to hand them to Harmssen?—There was an examination being carried on to see why these furs had not been sent. Harmssen asked if they had not been sent, and I handed the captain's copies to Harmssen.

Did he take them from the drawer or did Mr. Harmssen?—I took them.

Does he know if Mr. Harmssen went to the drawer?—I do not know.

Does he know if Harmssen afterwards went to the drawer to take them?—I do not know.

Did the witness have any conversation with any employe as to testimony he was to give at this trial?—No.

Ogata Bunkichi, another Japanese clerk in the shipping officer, was examined by Mr. Lowder, and identified certain bills of lading and insurance policies as in his hand writing.

Cross-examined—He did not know anything about shipments of goods by Mr. Leopold by other lines. Leopold's captain's copies were kept in a drawer in Leopold's desk. He believed there were others of the staff who knew they were kept there. If a captain's copy were found in the office after a ship had sailed it would be taken to mean that the goods had not been shipped. The manifest was made up from the captain's copies and both the manifest and the copies were handed to the captain at the starting of the steamer, so that after a steamer had started there should be no captain's copies in the office. He believed that it was the practice to deal with Leopold's captain's copies as with the others, and hand them to the Captain before the steamer's departure. Witness was aware that Leopold had occasionally issued bills of lading for other shippers before the goods were actually on board. He could not say at what date this was done, but it was about a year ago.

Witness afterwards said he could not answer this last question, as he only had to do with writing bills of lading and not with shipping goods. Continuing, he said he did not know of goods being shipped by Leopold without passing through the Pier Company.

Tanaka Tamejiro, clerk in the employ of Ahrens and Co., identified several bills of lading and insurance polices as in his handwriting, and said he wrote them at the instructions of accused, to whom he handed them.

Cross-examined—He did not know of any shipments by Leopold by other lines of steamers. He did not know of Leopold's ever sending goods forward by a steamer later than that for which the bill of lading was issued. He did not know what the "captain's copies" were, and therefore he could not say where Leopold kept them.

Mr. Lowder said there was another Japanese witness, but he had disappeared and the prosecution had been unable to trace him. The prosecution proposed to submit the evidence he gave at the preliminary waring.

After consultation with Mr. Litchfield, however, Mr. Lowder said his learned friend thought they would be unable to get in this evidence, and he would withdraw it from the Court's consideration.

Johann Andreas Harmssen, recalled, said he was in the employ of Ahrens & Co., and had been for about four years in Yokohama with them. Previously he was in the Kobe branch of the firm. In the month of Dec., 1897, he was assisting Leopold in the shipping and insurance department. In shipping cargo by the Norddeutscher Lloyd shippers usually first made application by letter, sometimes they called personally. A shipping order on a blue form was then written out, signed by Leopold or witness, and together with a set of bills of lading, was given to the applicant. The forms were filled up at the office, and contained marks, numbers, and the destination of goods. The firm had an arrangement with the Pier Traffic and Lighter Company, whose duty was to receive and store cargo and forward it to the steamer when she was in port. When they received cargo they gave a receipt to the shipper on a blue shipping order form and this was returned by the shipper to Ahrens and Co. Before the bil of lading was passed by the shipping department they had to have the receipt from the Pier Company. It was both Leopold's and witness's duty to examine bills of lading, but witness did most of it.

After being examined the bills were sent in by one of the Japanese clerks for the partners' signature. The bills of lading were prepared in sets usually of four copies. Three were given to the shipper, and one was retained. The one retained was unsigned and stamped as "captain's copy." Before despatching a steamer a manifest of cargo was prepared from the captain's copies. Besides the receipts from the Pier Company on the blue forms, the company was supplied with white forms. These white forms were sent with the cargo to the steamer, and after receipt on board one copy was signed by the officer of the steamship and returned to the Pier Company, and later on returned to the office. Sometimes it did not come back till after the steamer had gone. After it arrived the copy of the manifest remaining in the office was checked again by Japanese clerks by comparison with the white receipts. Any error in the manifest would be reported to witness. Witness knew that Leopold was in the habit of shipping goods on his own account. In the month of April witness had an interview with the accused in the hospital. Witness saw him alone the first time. After general conversation witness informed him that Ahrens and Company had received a telegram from the N.D. Lloyd at Bremen enquiring about 133 packages of furs shipped in December and January by Leopold. Witness asked him whether these goods where not shipped, and he admitted that they were not. Witness then asked him if he could give any reason, but he gave no proper explanation. Witness then drew his attention to the responsibility of the firm, because he had also mentioned to witness that bills of lading had been issued, but he attached no particular attention to that. Witness then remarked that he should speak to Mr. Wismer and that they would have to make further enquiries, as they could not trace the goods by themselves. Witness did not know where the original of the telegram from the N.D. Lloyd was; he believed it was in Yokohama.

Mr. Litchfield—Search for it and produce if to-morrow morning.

Witness, continuing, said he saw the accused afterwards in the presence of Mr. Hoffmann. Mr. Hoffmann tried to get out of Mr. Leopold the particulars of goods not shipped by him and his reasons why he had not shipped them. He also explained in what a serious position the firm would be put and asked for a suggestion as to the best way to face the difficulties. Leopold suggested a telegram to be sent to the N.D. Lloyd, which witness took down at his dictation. Leopold assured them that he would bring everything in order and that the firm would not lose a cent. The draft telegram produced was that which Leopold suggested should be sent. It was not all written by witness. The first seven words were written by Leopold himself: "Goods were kept back at shippers' request." The remainder was in witness's writing at Leopold's dictation: "Matter has been arranged between L and L. Goods to be resold here. Full remittances to Lampson's through us. Full explanation goes forward by mail." That was intended to be sent to the N.D. Lloyd, but was not sent. Witness believed the draft telegram (produced) was written at the same time: "Thanks, have arranged resale; have remitted £5000. T. T. Further remittances follow as soon as deliveries are made. Inform Lloyd." That telegram was intended to be sent to Lampson by Leopold. The first telegram was intended to be despatched by Ahrens. The second telegram was in witness's handwriting, but there were pencil marks by, he believed, Leopold. It read:—

May 2, 1898, Nexoma, London.

Thanks; have arranged resale. (Then in pencil) Have remitted £5000 T. T. (Then in pencil) through Ahrens and Co. Further remittances follow as soon as deliveries are made. (Then in pencil) Leopold.

"Nexoma, London" he believed was the telegraphic address of Lampson and Co.

The Court then rose.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY'S MESSAGE.

A forecast of President McKinley's message does not define the policy to be pursued in regard to the new colonies, but urges Congress to deliberate earnestly on the subject. It suggests the increase of the army, to 100,000, and demands money for the navy but proposes no financial or tariff changes.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS.

London, Dec. 8.

President McKinley's Message declares the construction of the Nicaragua canal with American control indispensable. Referring to China, the President claims friendly indiscriminating treatment of American commerce from the new occupants of the Chinese ports, and proposes the formation of a committee to study the commercial and industrial conditions in China. He also urges regular and frequent steamship communication under the American flag with the new possessions, including the Philippines, and endorses the increase of the army and navy.

THE EMPRESS DOWAGER'S WARLIKE MEASURES.

Peking, Nov. 30.

Considerable additions in men and material to the troops not only of Peking and its vicinity, but also of Mongolia and Manchuria, are being energetically but quietly pushed on, and the explanation of these warlike measures is that they are to "fight foreigners with." In consequence of this, the rowdy masses in the north are anxiously awaiting the signal, which certain officials of the Conservative party have promised to give, for a general uprising against foreigners and their Chinese friends. The edicts issued by the Empress Dowager since coming into power have inflamed the masses against foreigners to a dangerous degree.

YU MAN-TZE,

Chungking, Dec. 2.

Yü Man-tze is still at Lungshui, to which market town he retired since he rebelled the second time. His lieutenants have begun making their raids again on neighbouring towns and villages, devastating the country wherever they go. The troops, on the other hand, remain quiet in their encampments hoping to see Yü Man-tze lay down his arms of his own accord. The civil mandarins naturally dare not move in the matter.

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

Peking, Dec. 6.

The natives have seized and detained French missionaries in Szechuan prefecture. The French Representative in Peking has warned the Tsung-li Yamen that French troops will be sent into the prefecture unless the missionaries are released.

Peking, Dec. 8.

The Chinese Government has, by secret orders of the Empress Dowager, instructed Mr. Li, the Minister in Tokyo, to capture Mr. Kang Yu-wei dead or alive.

If the captured French missionaries are not restored to liberty by the Chinese authorities, it is expected that French troops will be despatched to Szechuan vid Yunnan. Great Britain is expected to protest against this movement of France.

The German Representative has demanded punishment of the local officials and the restoration of the missionaries with all honours.

It is stated that Great Britain will not prefer any great demands for compensation.

GAME No. 461.

THE COLOGNE CONGRESS.

A fine game won by the English representative from the ex-champion. Taken with notes from The Field:—

QUEEN'S GAMBIT DECLINED.

White—A. Burn.	Black—W. Steinitz.
1—P to Q 4	1—P to Q 4
2—P to Q B 4	2—P to K 3
3—Kt to Q B 3	3—Kt to K B 3
4—Kt to B 3	4—P takes P

This variation has been played several times at the recent Vienna tournament, and therefore thoroughly analysed. We do not think it favourable to Black, as it facilitates White's P to K 4 whilst the Pawn has to be given up again.

5—P to K 3	5—P to Q R 2
6—P to Q R 4	6—P to B 4
7—B takes P	7—Kt to B 3
8—Castles	8—B to Q 2
9—Q to K 2	9—Q to Kt 3
10—K to Q sq	10—R to Q sq
11—P to Q 5	11—P takes P
12—B takes Q B	12—B to K 2
13—P to K 4	13—Kt to Q 5
14—Q to B 4	14—Kt takes Kt ch

This exchange opens a dangerous attacking file. The alternative would be 14—Kt to K 3

15—P takes Kt	15—Castles
16—B to B 4	16—Kt to R 4

Obviously the Kt P cannot be taken.

17—B to Kt 3	17—Kt takes B
18—R P takes Kt

The Kt file being closed, an equally dangerous R file is opened instead.

	18—B to K B 3
19—R to Q 2	19—Q to Kt 5
20—P to R 5	20—Q takes Q
21—B takes Q	21—B to B 3
22—B to Q 5	22—R to Q 2
23—Kt to R 4	23—B takes Kt
24—R takes B	24—K R to Q sq
25—R to B 4	25—B to K 2

If 25—B to Q 5, then 26—P to Q Kt 4 &c.

26—R to Q 3	26—K to B sq
27—R to Kt 3	27—R to Kt sq
28—K to B sq	28—P to B 3

30—K to Q 3	30—K to K sq
31—R to B sq	31—K to Q sq
32—K to B 4

Mr. Burn's manœuvres ■ win this difficult ending with Bishops of different colour are very interesting. He fastens on to Black's weak points, whilst his own position is perfectly secure.

NOTE.

The match between Janowski and Showalter says an American Exchange, did not commence on 1st of Nov, according to arrangement, and there is apparently some hitch in the matter. It is believed that Showalter has found himself unable to raise his share of the stakes, as the Cosmopolitan Chess Club of New York has wired to him that it is prepared to make good any shortage in his stake money. Janowski, who came to the United States expressly to meet Showalter, is rather surprised at the treatment the Kentuckian has accorded him and he may be induced to enter into a match with Steinitz, who is now in New York and who is said to be perfectly willing to engage in such a combat. Meanwhile Janowski is giving New Yorkers ocular demonstration of his ability as a chess expert, and making arrangements for touring the country. He expresses himself as being fain to play his match with Showalter in Chicago or San Francisco.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, DEC. 17TH, 1898.

BIRTH.

On the 12th inst., the wife of R. RUEGG, of a son.

DEATH.

At No. 109, Bluff, on the night of the 11th inst., FRANK HERBERT HOOPER, of an aneurism; formerly of Bucklesham, Kent.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

SIR WILLIAM VERNON HARCOURT has resigned the leadership of the English Liberals.

COUNT OKUMA has come out as a resolute opponent of any increase of the Land Tax.

A VIOLENT thunderstorm broke over Yokohama on Thursday; the lightning flashes were very vivid.

THE Emperor has graciously approved of the gift of 20,000 yen voted from the Indemnity by the Diet.

THE new Pavilion of the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Club was formally opened last Saturday. There was a football match in the morning; tiffin at midday, and bicycle races during the afternoon.

THE Japanese Legation in Brussels was opened on the 5th inst. Its present home is the Hotel Bellevue.

FORMOSA continues to be greatly disturbed, the bandits growing more and more intrepid in their exploits.

THE notorious Mr. Tanaka Shozo has been temporarily expelled from the Lower House for breach of discipline.

GENERAL BROOKE has been appointed Military Governor of Cuba, with control over the civil and military administration.

THE Dreyfusite papers are now asserting that the late Colonel Henry was the real traitor and Major Esterhazy his accomplice.

THE French Government, in deference to the Budget Committee, has waived the proposed state guarantee of any part of the Tonkin railway loan.

MARQUIS ITO has delivered two important speeches this week on China and the necessity of supporting the home Government's financial policy.

THE Yokohama players gave another performance of The Magistrate on Thursday in aid of the funds of the General Hospital, and again achieved success.

ON the night of the 10th the police raided the house of a famous gambler named Takei Sadakichi, Kakigara-cho, Tokyo, and arrested 17 gamblers. The others escaped.

A LONDON despatch recently received by the Government says the torpedo-boat destroyer Yugiri has been launched. At her trial trip a speed of 30½ knots was made.

THE Emperor William, in opening the Reichstag, announced forthcoming Bills providing for an increase in the army, and preventing the terrorizing of workmen willing to work.

THE annual meeting of subscribers to the General Hospital was to have been held on Thursday afternoon, but, only four persons being present, a postponement was necessary.

THE Tokyo Tramway Company held its general meeting on the 10th and declared a dividend at the rate of 35 per cent. per annum. It was decided its increase the capital to yen 500,000.

ON Tuesday the Japanese steamer Yayeyama Maru, when entering Moji harbour, ran on to the P. & O. steamer Brindisi and sustained so much damage that she sank within four hours.

THE second "scene" in the House since the reassembling of the Diet occurred on Thursday, when Mr. Momma Shokei, disputing the Vice President's ruling, was removed by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

ON Thursday a meeting of the opponents of an increase of the Land Tax was held at the Maple Club, but, before the opening speech could be delivered, the police dispersed the gathering, due notice not having been furnished in accordance with the provisions of the law.

A KOREAN despatch announces the reply of the Government to the protest of the Powers against the order regarding the retirement of foreigners from Pyong-yang. Korea will not cancel the order, but postpones its enforcement indefinitely.

AT a meeting of seatholders held on Thursday it was resolved to sell the Settlement lots on which Christ Church and the Parsonage stand and buy a lot on the Bluff if a profit of yen 20,000 can be made by the exchange.

THE trial of E. C. Leopold in the British Court on a charge of obtaining credit from the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank under false pretences, concluded on Friday, when prisoner was found guilty and sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

A SUBSCRIPTION dance will be given in the Public Hall on Tuesday next in aid of the funds of the Cricket Club. During the first week in January a subscription fancy dress ball will be given at the same place in aid of the funds of Christ Church.

HERR VON BULOW, in a speech in the Reichstag on foreign affairs, said there were all sorts of questions and many points whereon Germany can go with England and does gladly go with her, while completely maintaining her other valuable connections.

THE peace treaty between America and Spain was signed at Paris on the 10th. The Times' Washington correspondent states that President McKinley favours selling the Philippines after their cession, but retaining Luzon as a coaling station. This was subsequently denied.

THE match manufacturers of Kobe and Osaka have decided to stop work for 17 days from the 1st January. The market at present is over supplied and prices are falling below remunerative figures. Present stocks are estimated at about 30,000 cases and no new business is expected for some time.

ACCORDING to the statistics of the Financial Department, the exports of Yokohama and Kobe last month amounted to yen 15,842,239 and the imports to yen 14,479,717, an excess of yen 1,362,822 in exports. The export of gold and silver amounted to yen 5,044,485, and the import to yen 197,026, an excess of yen 4,847,469 in exports.

BUSINESS, despite the season, continues very dull and the yearly clearing-up of accounts does not look very promising. A huge stock of goods is accumulated in Yokohama godowns, in anticipation of the new tariff, but these will be moved off very slowly. During the week enquiries have run principally on woollens and prices for these are firm. Metals are still dull, buyers not offering anything like the figures now ruling the home market. Kerosene is firm and so is sugar. In raw silk some extensive purchases are reported, but waste silk is quite dead. Nothing is now doing in tea.

THE TWENTY MILLIONS OF YEN.

Count Itagaki has thought it advisable, as leader of the Liberal Party, to explain his own motives in promoting the gift of 20,000,000 yen to the Throne. The explanation is slightly inartistic. Count Itagaki disavows all idea of swelling the possessions of the Throne in order that the habits of the Court may become more luxurious. Was such a disavowal necessary? Certainly the manner of the Emperor's life does not suggest that it was necessary. We doubt whether in the whole world there is a Sovereign who lives more frugally, or spends less upon ostentation or pleasure in any form. That all Japan's rulers will be similarly self-denying would be too much to hope, but that any addition to the yearly income of the present Emperor would betray His Majesty into spendthrift habits is a chimera which even foreigners must find extravagant. Count Itagaki further explains that the purpose of the vote is to bring under the Sovereign's control larger means of doing good. The Liberal leader's language is not so simple as our rendering suggests. In fact, it is very eloquent and learned language. But we translate its signification correctly when we say that the twenty millions are to enable the Emperor to give more substantial encouragement to distinguished ability in all spheres of life and to extend the Imperial benevolence to a larger circle of sufferers. It was difficult for Count Itagaki to express such ideas in language which should be entirely free from all shadow of impertinence, but we trust that we ourselves shall not be guilty of impertinence when we say that his manner of performing the task is not ideal. He adds that the effect will be to increase the nation's affection and veneration for the Throne, a consummation which few Japanese would be willing to consider necessary, and fewer still to pronounce possible.

The Imperial assent has been given to the Supplementary Budget transferring a sum of 20 million yen from the Indemnity to the Imperial Estates. The Presidents of the two Houses of the Diet were summoned to the Palace on the 15th instant, and entrusted with a message conveying His Majesty's acknowledgment of the motives that had influenced the vote. There have been many conjectures, first, as to whether the Sovereign would accept the money, and secondly, as to whether, if he did accept it, he would not at once devote it to some purpose notably beneficial to the nation. His Majesty, however, has simply acknowledged its receipt; the most dignified course under the circumstances. Whatever may be the destination of the yearly income derived from the fund, we may be sure that no part of it will be spent on pomp or luxury.

The general opinion of outsiders will be that in the present condition of the finances, these twenty millions might have been diverted to other purposes; but it is at all events re-assuring to find that the Diet and the Government take such a rosy view of the state of the Treasury. In one respect the appropriation seems to us a fortunate thing: it materially reduces the remnant of the Indemnity. The Indemnity has proved itself a decidedly mischievous asset. It has created an illusory notion that the Treasury always had a large marginal fund into which it cast when ordinary sources of income failed, and under the influence of that fancy the Legislature has paltered with its financial duties. If the Indemnity were entirely spent, the Diet would probably settle down resolutely to the business of making ends meet permanently.

THE LAND TAX AGITATION.

December 10.

The situation with reference to the Land Tax question is becoming almost comical, but so much depends on its favourable settlement that we are forbidden to be amused. On the 8th instant the parliamentary representatives and supporters of the Constitutional Party, to the number of over 160, assembled to hear the result of their leaders' consultations with the Cabinet. Count Itagaki made the report. The gist of what he had to tell was that the Government held its ground firmly, denying that, apart from the Land Tax, any permanently stable source of additional revenue could be found. The Constitutional Committee had suggested an increase of the tobacco-monopoly rates and the imposition of the tax on sugar, but the Ministers had replied that neither of those expedients could be trusted. Count Itagaki limited himself to stating these facts: he did not accompany them with any suggestion as to the course that the meeting ought to take. Nor did any debate ensue. A member proposed that the General Committee should again give the matter full consideration, should submit it once more to a meeting of the Council, and should then present another report to the members in full conclave. The proposal was accepted nem. con.

It is plain that the Constitutional Party recognises its responsibility in connexion with this grave problem, and is determined not to act hastily. Meantime Marquis Ito's return to Tokyo is understood to be the result of a request addressed to him by the Cabinet through Marquis Saigo, and is generally believed to have for its object the reconciling of the Liberal Party to the Land Tax. Marquis Ito of course visited the Palace and had a two hours' audience, but he has also been in direct communication with the Liberal leaders, urging them to lay aside petty considerations of party interests, and to give their support to a measure of essential necessity to the country. Marquis Ito is said to have been literally besieged by callers since he arrived in Tokyo. He is staying at the residence of Baron Suyematsu in Shiba, and is said not to be in very robust health.

December 12.

The Progressists—in other words, the "Real Constitutionalists" (Kensei-hontō)—have decided to make a party question of the proposed increase of the Land Tax, and to organize a strong opposition to the measure. A grand union has also been formed with that object. The preliminaries were arranged at a meeting in the Maple Club on the 8th instant, when about 210 persons assembled, among them being 87 members of the Lower House and three or four of the Upper, including Viscount Tani. The Union calls itself Chiso-zōchō hantai Dōmei, an exceptionally clumsy epithet. It was decided, among other things, at the meeting that should this question lead to the dissolution of the House, the Union would devote its strength to bring about the re-election of the present Progressist members of the Diet.

On the other side, a formidable association of Business Men has been organized. Its field of operations extends to Tokyo, Nagoya, Osaka, Yokohama, Kobe, Kuwana, Kanazawa, Kyoto, Hakodate, and Nagasaki, and it includes such names as those of Baron Iwasaki, Baron Mitsui, Mr. Shibusawa, Mr. Fujita, Mr. Konoike, and, in short, nearly all the magnates of commercial and industrial circles. A great gathering of the projectors was held in the Imperial Hotel on the 8th instant, and they decided to form themselves into the Jitsugyoka Dōdomei, with their head office in the Hotel. It is the first time that men of the Iwasaki, the Mitsui, the Fujita, and the Konoike families have united for a political purpose—if this financial question can be properly called political—and the union must have immense influence.

Viscount Tani and Mr. Tomita Tetsunosuke, leaders of the anti-land-tax movement, have addressed a circular to all the constituencies, urging them to combine against the measure. The principal argument advanced is that the Emperor promised, in 1873, that the Land Tax should be reduced ultimately to 1 per cent. of the land. The circular recommends the constituencies not to return one of the members favourable to the Tax, should dissolution of the Lower House necessitate new elections. Viscount Tani is now in his element.

December 13.

A compromise seems to have been effected in the matter of the Land Tax. On the 11th inst., the Council of the Constitutional Party held a meeting, and after some discussion came to the conclusion that the most advisable course for the Party was to accept the principle of the Government's Bill and modify the details. The Government proposes to raise the rate of the Tax from 2.5 to 4 per cent. The Council thinks that it should not be raised above 3.3 per cent. The effect of that reduction would be to diminish the revenue set down in the Government's estimates by 6,805,653 yen in 1899-1900, and by 8,233,626 yen in 1900-1. Our readers may be puzzled at first to understand why the same measure should produce a different result in two consecutive years. The explanation is that the full revenue accruing from an increase in the rate of the Land Tax will not be realized until the second year after the increase. To provide for this loss of anticipated income, the Council proposes that the price of tobacco under the Monoply should be augmented, so as to yield an additional revenue of 3 millions, approximately, and that the tax on urban building lands should be raised so as to give three millions more. The Council's views will doubtless be endorsed by the Party, and we may assume that the Government also will accept the compromise.

December 15.

The contest over the question of the Land Tax is very close. Each of the great political associations has made the question a party issue, and both are straining every nerve to win the victory. A short time ago, it seemed probable that a cave would be formed among the Progressists, for several members of the Party, under the leadership of Mr. Shimada Saburo, are strongly in favour of increasing the tax. But that prospect no longer exists, for Mr. Shimada has announced that, although he approves of the Land Tax as a means of obtaining additional revenue, he can not consent to its increase until the programme of military expansion has been reduced. He does not propose, indeed, to go back to the military establishment as it was at the time of the war, but he thinks that an expansion of 50 per cent. would have been sufficient, and he therefore advocates the disbanding of three of the additional Divisions organized under the post-bellum programme. Mr. Taguchi appears to share Mr. Shimada's views in that respect, so both will probably speak and vote against the measure when it comes up for discussion in the Lower House. Meanwhile, Count Okuma has stepped forward as an uncompromising opponent of any addition to the burden of the agricultural class. Count Okuma, when he held the portfolio of Foreign Affairs in the Matsukata Cabinet last year, was understood to be in favour of increasing the Land Tax. At all events, he remained a member of a Ministry which had compiled, and was about to present to the Diet, a Budget based on Land-Tax increase. When, however, the Progressists severed their relations with the Cabinet and Count Okuma resigned his portfolio, it appeared that, although not condemning the Land-Tax proposal on principle, he considered the time inopportune for such a measure, in view of the failure of the rice crop last year. But now he condemns any and every increase of the Land Tax, whether in the present or in the future, and, with characteristic energy, has thrown himself heart and soul into the struggle, using the press freely to ventilate his opinions, taking up his quarters at the Imperial Hotel in order to be within easy reach of the arena, and announcing his intention of speaking at the meeting of the Hi-chisosāchō Dōmei kai, which takes place on the 15th instant in the Maple Club. Despite this agitation and energy, however, the anti-land-tax men appear to be in the minority, though, indeed, it is a very small minority. The advocates of increase claim that they have 155 votes in the Lower House—namely, 104 Liberals, 20 National Unionists, 26 Business Men, and 5 seceders from the Progressists—whereas the other side assert that they command 148 votes. The figures may not be perfectly accurate—indeed they can not be, for they aggregate 303 members in a House of 300—but the significant fact is that the Progressists confess themselves in a minority. The Yomiuri, which always fights in the van of the Progressists, virtually throws up the sponge. It says that the opponents of the tax entered the field too late, and that nothing remains for them now except to organize their strength for the repeal of the measure next session. Perhaps we should premise that the favorable attitude of the Liberals is based on the compromise suggested by the Party's Council, namely, an increase from 2.5 per cent. to 3.3 per cent., instead of to 4 per cent., as the Cabinet proposes.

Digitized by Google

December 16.

It is stated that twenty-six parliamentary members of the Constitutional Party have asked permission to oppose the bill for increasing the Land Tax. The regulations of the Party contain a provision to the effect that when a member is unavoidably prevented from endorsing a measure approved by the Party in its collective capacity, he may seek permission by exercise his own discretion, without severing his connexion with the Party. Under that provision these twenty-six members are said to have made application to the General Committee. The statement is made by the Jimmin, which, as an organ of the Constitutionalists, ought to be well informed. Of course the loss of twenty-six votes would completely defeat the bill. Even its supporters did not claim a plurality of more than five votes, when their last calculations were made, and they then reckoned on obtaining the support of the whole Liberal Party. Twenty-six secessions would give the victory into the hands of the Opposition.

A HUNDRED LOSSES AND NOT ONE GAIN.

That is Count Okuma's verdict about the proposed increase of the Land Tax. A section of the large landed proprietors are very well off, he says, and, observing their condition, some folks are led to conclude hastily that an additional burden would be easily borne by the agricultural classes. Such critics take no account of the great mass of the farmers throughout the empire—the men who are farming a quarter of an acre, or half an acre, or, perhaps, one or two acres, and are obliged to rent additional land in order to support themselves. These men are the foundations of the nation. They are industrious honest folk, now sincerely anxious to improve their methods of agriculture, and with that object they contribute to the support of associations for judging agricultural products and procedure. Increase their taxes, and they will cease to be able to make any effort towards improvement. The truth is that the burden borne by the farmers has always been greater than that of the mercantile and manufacturing classes, and the difference has become even more marked of late years since local taxes, communal expenses, and so forth have steadily increased. Things are worse now than they were in feudal times, for the hardship of the conscription has been added. Owing to the conscription system, an able-bodied man loses three years of his life just at a time when he could earn 60 or 70 yen a year if he remained at home. Then, after his service with the colours is completed, he has to devote one month annually for 4 years to military duties. The returns show that one-third of the school-age children do not attend school, and of these the greater number are farmers' children, from which fact the impecunious condition of the agricultural class may be inferred. Sanitary measures also are incomplete. Dysentery, typhoid, cholera and such diseases destroy about 100,000 lives annually, whereas the war with China cost only three or four thousand. The farmer must incur considerable expenses for hygienic purposes, and if his taxes are increased, he will be unable to fulfil that essential duty. Then there is the question of riparian improvement. Enormous losses are caused annually by floods. The State has the responsibility of defraying the cost of some riparian works, but the bulk of them must be paid for by the farmer. Thus to increase the Land Tax is to destroy the system of local autonomy.

Count Okuma then passes on to other phases of the problem. People make the mistake, he says, of supposing that an increase of the Land Tax would improve the prospects for the commercial and industrial classes. It is easy to expose the fallacy of such a notion. The poorer the farmers become, the smaller the funds at their disposal to purchase goods. The meaning of that from commercial and industrial points of view is evident. Again pilgrims to Ise and worshippers at Hongwan-ji would diminish in number, and the meaning of that to the railways is evident. In short, the prosperity of the towns depends on the conditions of the provinces. It is equally erroneous to speak of the Land Tax as the best means of placing the finances on a sound footing. To tax the land is to tax the very root of production. There can be no worse tax. The proceeds of such a tax never increase. For twenty years the yield of the Land Tax in Japan has remained absolutely stationary. But an essential feature of a good tax is that its yield should grow with the growth of the nation. In that sense such taxes as those on imports, on saké, on tobacco, and on incomes are good taxes. Before many years have passed, the customs dues will amount to 40 or 50 million yen. The other taxes produce increased incomes every year, so that they suffice to maintain financial stability. There is no reason to impose a bad tax. Besides, nothing is more precarious than the crops. They may be largely reduced, or even destroyed, at any time by a natural calamity or by an attack of insects. To apply the epithet stable to revenue derived from such a source is the acme of thoughtlessness. As for the high price of rice so much talked of by the advocates of the tax, it is true that rice was dear during the spring and summer, but it has fallen now to 8 yen a koku. Just because the agricultural class have begun to live better, lodge better, and wear better clothes, they are at once called luxurious, and reckless proposals to tax them are put forward. Their manner of life is in truth pitiful. Only in spring and autumn do they know the taste of fish. They lack physical strength to engage in keen competition, and they can not be expected to make good soldiers. They ought to be able to eat meat once a week, but to increase the Land Tax would still further lower their scale of living. There is talk of re-assessing the taxable value of the Land, but apparently Tohoku, Kiushiu and all the other districts are to be placed on the same footing. That would be most unjust. The Tohoku region is buried in snow during the winter. Only one crop can be raised there, whereas in Shikoku and Kiushiu two crops are obtained. "My final conclusion is that to increase the Land Tax would check the improvement of agriculture, would destroy the possibility of local autonomy, would impair commerce and industry, would embarass the farmers who constitute the bulk of the nation, and would not place the finances on a sound footing. Therefore I say that it would be productive of a hundred ills and not one good. And I make that assertion with respect not to the present alone, but also to the future."

By way of contrast to the above, we translate the gist of a circular addressed by Mr. Taguchi and others to the members of the House of Representatives. Some years ago, the circular says, the aim of the representatives returned by the agricultural class was to reduce the Land Tax from 2½ to 2 per cent. But it was found impossible to effect administrative economies warranting such a reduction. Then politicians turned to a reassessment of the taxable value of the land, but even that could not be managed. Then the Matsukata Cabinet of 1897 changed the monetary standard, reducing the gold price of the yen to one half of its original figure and thereby cutting down the Land Tax by 50 per cent. If, now, the rate be raised to 4 per cent., it will be really 2 per cent., when expressed in the currency of former years. Hence the representatives of the farmers have obtained what they so strenuously and unsuccessfully endeavoured to achieve in the early days of the Diet. Moreover, the taxable value of the land is to be re-assessed. So the farmers are getting more than they ever asked for. Again, the yearly revenue derived from rural lands at present is 35 million yen. With rice at 9 yen a koku as it is to-day, 4 millions of koku pay the tax. But prior to the re-assessment of the tax in 1874, the farmers paid 12 million koku. They are, in fact, three times as lightly taxed now as they were 25 years ago, without taking into account the facts that 12 million koku represented a larger fraction of the rice crop in 1873 than the same quantity represents to-day, and that the farmers have since then developed other prolific sources of income.

CHINESE AS JOURNALISTS.

The journalistic projects of Kang Yu-wei's disciples in Yokohama seem to have matured. On the 23rd instant, the public is promised the first number of a magazine to be called the Seigi Jumpo, a title which the projectors appear to have borrowed from Truth. It is to appear every tenth day and the editor is Mr. Leung Kei-chiu, a well-known follower of Kang Yu-wei. From January a daily paper—the Nippo, or "daily intelligence"—will be published from the same office.

POLITICIANS AND GOVERNORS.

Baron Sonoda held the position of Chief of Police under the last Ito Cabinet, and distinguished himself by an almost violently conservative address to the inspectors under his command when the Administration was handed over to the two Parties last July. He resigned his post, of course, and was attacked in bitter terms by the party organs. In short, his unpopularity was so great that it contributed materially to swell the outcry then raised against the Bureau of Metropolitan Police and to strengthen the demands for its abolition. When the present Cabinet came into power, Marquis Saigo, the new Minister of Home Affairs, appointed Baron Sonoda to be chief of the Hokkaido Administration. But the party politicians in that part of the Empire do not forget his doings last July, or, perhaps, he has taken some step which quickens their memory. The section of the Constitutional Party in the northern island has held a meeting and decided unanimously that he is not fitted for the position. Will they succeed in getting the leaders of the Party to espouse their opinion? It is a suggestive incident. Imagine the Conservatives in an English shire taking a similar step with regard to some official newly appointed to the county. Japanese party politicians have not apparently learned anything of the discipline without which party government is a practical impossibility.

THE OWNERSHIP OF LAND BY FOREIGNERS.

Too much zeal is a dangerous equipment for an advocate. A case in point is the criticism evoked by the recent trouble between Messrs. Vantine and Company and a Japanese whom they had employed to carry on a branch of their business in Nagoya. The Japanese embezzled monies which, of course, could not be recovered, and he also showed a disposition to retain possession of certain immovable property which, though purchased with his employers' money, was registered in his name so as to evade the law which forbids the acquisition of real estate by foreigners outside the Settlements. Referring to this incident, a Kobe journal writes:—

> The whole story is one more proof of the difficulties with which foreigners will have to contend even after the Revised Treaties come into operation so long as the Japanese Government maintains its present attitude on the question of land. . . . In the case under consideration, it appears that as the result of the measure taken Messrs. Vantine & Co. have recovered most of their property, movable and immovable, but will probably lose the money which is alleged to have been embezzled by their employé. There will always remain that risk until the Japanese Government boldly faces the questions at issue and gives foreigners in Japan the same rights that Japanese possess in almost all the other countries of the world.

This is agreeably inconsequential. What is the risk that will remain always, "even after the Revised Treaties come into operation"? We can not suppose that the writer refers to embezzlement of money, though his language admits of no other construction. The direct or vicarious tenure of land has nothing to do with the embezzlement of money. Doubtless this confusion of ideas is due to mere clumsiness of phraseology, and the editor's intention is to refer solely to land tenure. But then we have again to ask, what is the risk which will "always remain." Is it conceivable that after the Revised Treaties go into force any foreigner will be so foolish as to purchase land and register it in a Japanese name when he can obtain a lease of it for a hundred or two hundred years in his own name? The intelligent and intelligible reasons in favour of removing all restrictions upon land tenure by foreigners are conclusive, and such thoughtless writing as that quoted above tends only to create bewilderment and distrust in Japanese minds.

THE "KASAGI KAN."

News is published to the effect that the responsibility for the accident to the Kasagi Kan rests entirely on the pilot who was in charge of the vessel, and that the repairs—which are not of much consequence—will be performed without any cost to Japan. Neither will any delay be caused in the matter of shipping the armament. The Kasagi will be able to leave Newcastle for Japan in February, the date originally arranged.

REFORM OF THE ELECTORAL SYSTEM.

The Government's proposals for the reform of the election system are apparently considered satisfactory by the public, for virtually no exception is taken to them. There are, indeed, some expressions of regret that the property qualification has not been reduced to a maximum of 3 yen in the form of direct taxes, and that the minimum age for candidates is not fixed at 25 years instead of 30. Very likely amendments in that sense will be proposed in the Lower House where liberal principles find extreme advocates. There will also be a discussion about the method of voting. The plan suggested in the Bill is called tanki kimei tôhiyo; that is to say, each voter hands in a signed ballot for each candidate. Thus in Tokyo, which would have 16 representatives under the new system and would, at the same time, be one electoral district, every franchise-holder would cast 16 ballots. There is thus no provision whatever for minority representation. Some publicists contend that a better plan would be to combine the renki and the tanki systems in equal proportions; in other words, to require each voter to write one half of the number of candidates on one ballot, and to cast separate ballots for the other half. For party purposes the latter method would be more convenient, and its effect would also be to reduce the trouble of voting. But it would not help the minority. We are surprised that the Government does not seek to obtain the Diet's consent to the simple expedient of limiting each voter's ballots. For example, if in Tokyo a voter's ballots were limited to thirteen, the remaining three would be elected by the minority. We do not mean, of course, that thirteen to three is an ideal ratio. The figures are nothing. Our reference is to the principle only.

ENTERTAINMENT AT THE FRENCH LEGATION.

An interesting and novel entertainment was given by the French Minister and Madame Harmand at the French Legation on Saturday, the 10th inst. Their Imperial Highnesses Princes Kanin and Komatsu (jun.) were present, as well as a number of other guests both Japanese and foreign. The chief feature of the entertainment was an exhibition of specimens of the new coloured photography. They were shown by M. Veyre, an agent and assistant of Lumiere. He prefaced the display by giving a short résumé of the history of photography with an explanation of the manner in which this new triumph of photographic art has been attained. Most of the pictures represented flowers which, owing to their rich colouring, are specially suitable subjects for illustrating the novel photography. In one a variety of jewels were shown, each colour being wonderfully reproduced. The cinematograph was subsequently brought into play and a number of realistic scenes were shown to the audience. The evening ended with dancing, which, of course, was kept up to a late hour. The entertainment was altogether consistent with the high reputation that French hospitality has won in Tokyo.

THE STATE RAILWAY QUESTION.

The project for the State purchase of the chief private railways seems to be gaining ground. We read in vernacular newspapers that the Constitutional Party has determined to introduce in the Lower House a Representation to the Government, urging that the Nippon and Sanyo Lines should be converted into public property in order that the State may have control of the main trunk line from the north to the south of the central island. The sum mentioned for the acquisition of these roads is 120 million yen, and the idea is that it should be raised by a domestic loan. As to the method of paying the shareholders there has been a difference of opinion, one section of the party advocating half payment down and the remaining half by yearly instalments, whereas another section advises that the whole disbursement be spread over a term of years. The latter view is said to have prevailed. It will be observed that this version makes no mention of the Kobu and Kiushiu lines, which have always hitherto been spoken of as part of the scheme. Moreover, we read in another Tokyo newspaper that Viscount Yoshikawa, the Minister of Home Affairs, has been consulting Mr. Miura as to the ideas of the Kobu shareholders, and that he will take a similar step with regard to the Kiushiu folks. Probably the sum mentioned above is the estimated purchase price of the four railways. Even on that hypothesis it is generously large. We should think, too, that the raising of the money in Japan is quite hopeless. With the Government's 5 per-cent. securities selling at 93, and the best Banks giving 7 per-cent. on fixed deposits, what conceivable chance is there of floating a domestic loan of 160 million yen on terms consistent with any principles of sound finance?

OUTRAGES IN RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

Close on the heels of the news that a captain of infantry had been murdered and robbed in a carriage on the Sanyo Railway comes news that a Kobe dancing girl, travelling by the same line on the night of the 6th, was robbed of 50 yen and thrown out of the train at a point some three or four hundred yards from Himeji station. The girl—Tanaka Hisa—fell into a rice-field and happily escaped without injury, but the ruffian that assaulted her has left no clue. It is singular that these two incidents should have occurred on the Sanyo Railway, which is the best appointed and the best organised line in Japan. We read in vernacular papers that the Directors have resolved to make up the night trains in future with carriages free from partitions; and, further, to attach two servants to every express train. They have also applied to the Authorities to place two or three policemen in the through trains.

Are the Directors of the Sanyo Railway Company responsible, we wonder, for the term "boy" which has been repeatedly used by the press in speaking of the servants attached by the Company to the trains on its line. "Boy" is a form of expression never used in England to designate a man-servant. The French garçon cannot be properly translated by "boy." How the term came to be employed throughout the East in addressing servants or speaking of them, we do not know. Possibly it is a fiction expressly devised for the solace of ladies, who certainly employ male servants in China and Japan for domestic purposes which would be considered entirely beyond the proper province of a man in England or America, though not, perhaps, in some countries of Continental Europe. We have sometimes thought that the term a "boy housemaid" may sound less objectionable in the ears of a modest lady than "man housemaid," and if so the solecism may be condoned to some extent. But surely the Japanese should avoid the importation of such an epithet into their language. It is almost as bad as calling a dog a "come here."

FORMOSA.

The latest group of telegrams from Formosa are these:—

Taipeh, Nov. 19.

The conduct of Kan Taishi (a bandit chief whose submission was recently reported) being suspicious in many respects, troops have been posted at points of vantage and a force of police will be sent to-morrow morning to surround his position. Should he offer any resistance, measures will be taken accordingly.

Taipeh, Dec. 11th, afternoon.

Kan Taishi, the brigand leader who recently made act of submission, having again rebelled, has been attacked forthwith.

Taipeh, Dec. 12, 12.30 a.m.

(From Governor-General Kodama to the War Department.)

The bandit leader Kan Taishi, whose haunt is in the neighbourhood of the Tafton mountains, has proved false to his pledge of submission. Consequently, before day-break on the 11th a force was despatched to clear out his lair. Up to the present, the corpses of over forty bandits have been counted, but it is not known whether Kan's body is among them.

Taipeh, Dec. 13.

The expeditionary force in the district of the 13th Brigade is gradually advancing into the mountains near Kotai. From the 29th ultimo to the 6th instant, the number of bandits killed was 552, and the number taken prisoner, 188. Many swords, spears, and other weapons have been seized, together with 163 guns. The losses on the Japanese side are 2 wounded. The weather is fine, and there are very few in valids. Communication is difficult in the mountainous regions, and some embarrassment is experienced in the transport of supplies. Bandits are lurking in the hills near the Shrine of Kwangu outside the region where repressive measures are in progress, and the roads in the neighbourhood of Tainan are in an unsafe condition.

This intelligence seems to indicate that Formosa is still in a very disturbed condition. Evidently the conciliatory measures recently resorted to have proved abortive, in some cases at all events. We may take it for granted that when the Chinese were in possession of the island, they did not administer its affairs with anything like the vigour and ability shown by the Japanese, yet, if a judgment is to be based on results alone, the Chinese were more successful. It is a curious fact. An explanation would offer readily enough if the Japanese had adopted a resolute policy in extending the limits of the sphere of civilization in the island, for they would then have found themselves in conflict with forces which the Chinese left severely alone. But the Japanese have not pursued such a policy. It is true that they have established fairly good relations with the aborigines, but that proceeding did not involve any recourse to arms, and the bandits now proving so troublesome are not the aboriginal inhabitants, but the disaffected Chinese. The low lands were certainly freer from raiders and their inhabitants enjoyed greater security of life and property in the old days than they do now. What is the cause? The answer given by competent observers is that the Japanese have failed to win the confidence or the respect of the Chinese. They have not failed, indeed, to make themselves feared. The list of losses set down above would be sufficient to dispel any doubt on that head, for if the Japanese troops can kill 552 bandits and take 188 prisoners with no casualties beyond 2 wounded on their own side, they must be giving to the Chinese a conclusive object lesson in drastic methods. The respect we speak of is a different matter.

It is the respect which the Chinese very soon learn to feel for Englishmen, or Americans, or Germans with whom they are brought into contact, and it arises just as much from their observation of the foreigners' method of life as from the treatment they experience at his hands. People who have been to Formosa say that the Japanese official's manner of existence and the integrity of his ways are not such at to make a Chinaman look up to him. It is not necessary that an official should inhabit a fine house or surround himself with luxuries, but it is necessary that his habits should not be such as to bring him into contempt. Force can always be employed. The Japanese are thoroughly competent to employ it. But in a country like Formosa, where military operations can never be more than partially successful, to save the situation by force alone must be a matter of years, whereas if moral suasion were brought into play, months would suffice. We believe firmly that if England and Japan changed places in Formosa, the pacification of the island would have been effected long ago. Not that the Japanese are without administrative capacity. We have no right to express a definite opinion on that point. But they certainly are without the experience of which England has laid up a rich store in governing alien races, and unfortunately they deem it a humiliation to avail themselves of that experience, whereas the real humiliation consists in making a bad failure through self-opinionated reluctance to employ available aids. The lesson which the Governor-General is now giving to the bandits may terrify them into quiescence for a while, but the fact will still stand to Japan's discredit that, three and a half years after taking possession of the island, she is still obliged to undertake an extensive slaughter of the inhabitants. Does it not occur to the Japanese that they are playing to a critical and not over-lenient gallery, and that when their qualifications to undertake the task of civilizing and administering a foreign country come to be reckoned up,—as may be the case at any moment in connexion with the dismemberment of China,—this Formosan Drama will certainly not tell in their favour?

The bandits in Formosan are apparently getting more resolute. A telegram from Taipeh, dated 2 p.m. on the 13th instant, announces that an attack was made by them on the South-Formosan branch of the Bank of Japan. They were driven off by a detachment of Japanese troops stationed in the neighbourhood, the latter losing one man. Nothing is said about the casualties on the side of the bandits. They carried away a quantity of mail matter, supposing it to be paper money.

THE VANTINE CASE.

An instance of misplaced confidence is reported in detail by the Kobe Shimbun. The facts are said to be these:—Messrs. Vantine and Company established a branch of their business in Nagoya, employing a Japanese named Funamoto to conduct the affairs of the branch in his own name, since Nagoya, being outside treaty limits, is not a place where foreigners may lawfully engage in commerce. Funamoto proved unequal to the trust. He advanced twenty thousand yen, unwisely it would seem, to Japanese merchants, and he squandered an equal sum on his own amusements. When called to account by Messrs. Vantine and Company, he displayed at first a disposition to deny their right of interference, since the business was conducted, and the immovable property registered, in his name, not in theirs. Ultimately they appear to have brought him to a more docile frame of mind through the assistance of a Tokyo barrister, though on what grounds the latter intervened it is not easy to perceive. That is the story; a sufficiently simple tale but not without a moral. The moral is, why did Messrs. Vantine and Company repose such confidence in Funamoto? His antecedents were good, it is true. A graduate of the Doshisha, a professing Christian and a spotless record for some years—these are all favorable passports to trust. But from the moment that Funamoto agreed to act as manager of a branch of Messrs. Vantine and Company's business in Nagoya, lending his own name for purposes of dissimulation, from that moment he became a law-breaker and consequently ceased to be worthy of full confidence. Messrs. Vantine and Company were law-breakers also. It is amusing to observe the elastic morality with which a Kobe journal treats this question. There is nothing in the treaties, it says, to forbid partnership between foreigners and Japanese and "no harm can possibly be done to anybody because a foreigner holds land in a Japanese name." Such pleading has not even the merit of being ingenious. To carry on commerce is not wrong per se, nor is it wrong to own land, but in Japan neither operation is permitted to foreigners beyond the limits fixed by treaty, and no commonly honest critic can pretend that what is contrary to law is sanctioned by morality. As to the degree of the offence, little need be said, for to evade a restriction due primarily to international illiberality and racial prejudice can not be called a very blameworthy act. None the less any Japanese agreeing to become the agent in a transaction of the kind ought to be regarded with a certain measure of distrust, and if the confidence reposed by foreigners in such Japanese is not more frequently abused, the fact speaks rather for the latter's integrity than for the former's prudence. There is, indeed, a singular inconsistency between the avowals of many foreign residents and their actions. While denouncing the Japanese in general as untrustworthy, each of them nevertheless claims to have in his employment a Japanese deserving of all trust, and not a few unhesitatingly incur risks which in Europe would be thought quite unjustifiable, for they purchase real property and register it in the name of a native servant or of a Japanese friend without any social status. Similar ventures would end disastrously in a majority of cases were they tried in an Occidental country.

DISPERSAL OF A POLITICAL MEETING.

On the 15th instant, the opponents of Land-Tax increase began to assemble at the Maple Club in Shiba from 8 a.m., according to the arrangement already referred to in these columns. Count Okuma, Viscount Tani, Viscount Miura, and other prominent politicians of both Houses of the Diet were present, and it is stated that, before 10 a.m. when the proceedings were to commence, a great crowd numbering from 3,000 to 3,500 persons had assembled, filling the corridors of the building and completely occupying the garden. Mr. Hiraoka Kitaro, having taken the chair, announced that Viscount Tani would first address the meeting. The Viscount thereupon ascended the platform, and commenced his speech with these words:—

"GENTLEMEN—The bill which the Cabinet has submitted to the Diet, providing for an increase of the Land Tax, is an insufferable affair, and we must endeavour to oppose it."

At this point an Inspector of Police stepped forward, and, calling Viscount Tani by name, informed him that the meeting was suspended. The Viscount attempted to address some further remarks to the audience, apparently in explanation of this interference, but the Inspector warned him that, after the mandate of suspension had gone forth, no speaking could be allowed. Viscount Tani, however, persisted, and many of the people in the vicinity of the platform began to hustle the constables who, by this time, had advanced from several directions towards the rostrum. There was, in short, every appearance of a disturbance, when Count Okuma came forward, and called out that, much as he regretted being prevented from expressing his opinions, there was no course for the meeting except to obey the representatives of the law. Mr. Tanaka Shozo also appeared at this juncture gesticulating vehemently and calling for three cheers for the Emperor, and Mr. Kono Hironaka suggested three cheers for the Anti-Land Tax-Increase League. Both calls were vigorously responded to, and the meeting finally dispersed, indulging in a great deal of invective against official tyranny.

The alleged grounds of this interference by the police are declared by the Hochi Shimbun to have been that the meeting was calculated to injure public peace and good order. But we believe that the Hochi's anti-Cabinet bias is responsible for that version. The probable truth is that the meeting was held in violation of the law. It was called a Konshin kai, or friendly gathering, and, as such, did not require to be notified to the police beforehand. But it was not a Konshin-kai. It was a Seiji-kai, or political meeting, and due notice of the intention to hold it should, therefore, have been conveyed to the police 24 hours in advance. The police are not competent to interdict the holding of political meetings. Notice is given, not for the purpose of obtaining their consent, but merely to enable them to make whatever preparations they may consider necessary in the interests of public peace. The first few words of Viscount Tani's speech indicated beyond question that the meeting was to be invited to discuss political topics, and it immediately became an illegal assembly, the forms prescribed by law not having been observed. There will, of course, be a great deal of talk about this affair, and many critics will accuse the authorities of arbitrary conduct; but it is to be observed that the present Law of Public Meeting and Political Association was made by the Diet, not by the Administration, and if the men who assisted to frame it, namely, the Progressists, do not choose to observe its provisions, they have no right to complain because their disobedience causes them inconvenience. The particular provision of the Law which led to the dispersal of the Maple-Club meeting is a mere measure of precaution. Its observance can not, in any way, impair the privilege of free speech. Its sole object is to place the police in possession of information without which they might fail to make due arrangements for the preservation of good order. There can be no hardship in sending a brief notice to the police on the day before a meeting. Indeed, one is almost tempted to think that deliberation, not accident, was responsible for the omission made by the projectors of the Maple-Club meeting. Nothing could have happened more conducive to the interests of their game than this intervention by the police, for it will at once have the effect of carrying the discussion from the sphere of calm discussion into the realm of passion and prejudice. If they contemplated that result and wittingly planned the coup, they will probably have reason to congratulate themselves on their tactics, for in this new phase of the contest many persons hitherto neutral or wavering will probably join the Anti-tax League.

SHIPWRECK AND HEAVY LOSS OF LIFE.

The Tokyo Asahi reports the loss of a Japanese fishing junk and 41 lives. The vessel left Kaitorigata in Shiribeshi, some time ago, for the purpose of salmon-fishing in the waters off Saghalien. Having completed her operations, she commenced her return voyage on the 28th of September, in the face of bad weather, and was wrecked in the neighbourhood of Nanatsujima on the 2nd October, only two out of her crew of forty-three escaping. She had on board, at the time of the disaster, 400 koku of salted salmon and 1,800 bags of salt.

THE TITLE OF "DOCTOR."

The Official Gazette announces that there shall hereafter be nine distinct degrees of "Doctor" instead of five as heretofore; namely, Doctor of Law, Doctor of Medicine, Doctor of Pharmaceutics, Doctor of Engineering, Doctor of Literature, Doctor of Physics, Doctor of Agriculture, Doctor of Forestry, and Doctor of Veterinary Science. We may mention that it is the usual custom to use the term Hakase in the sense of "Doctor," but according to the Authorities of the University the proper form of expression is Hakushi.

MARQUIS ITO'S SPEECH.

On the 10th instant, Marquis Ito was present at a meeting of the Constitutional Party, the Ministers of State, Baron Ito, and other notables in the Imperial Hotel. The object of the meeting was to welcome the Marquis on his return from China, and to hear his views on current affairs. Count Itagaki presided, and in a brief speech expressed the pleasure that those present felt in receiving the distinguished statesman and in having an opportunity of hearing his valuable opinion. Marquis Ito then spoke as follows :—

Yesterday Mr. Hayashi conveyed to me, gentlemen, an expression of your desire that I should attend this evening and make a statement of my views. I can not pretend that I have any special claim to occupy your attention, but since you have been good enough to invite me, I gladly comply with your wishes. When I resigned my official position in June last, as you are aware, and found that I had some leisure, I felt that I ought, if possible, to pay a visit to China and Korea in order to obtain direct knowledge of the state of affairs in those countries. I deem it fortunate that I was able to carry out my project, yet I am conscious now that to enter into any detailed statement this evening of the conditions existing in the two empires would be a matter of much difficulty. If I limited myself to an account of what I have seen and heard, I might easily address you; but to descend below the surface and lay before this meeting an intimate résumé of China's state would be a serious task. In truth, the present condition of China offers features of a particularly perplexing character. That is not merely my individual opinion. I had many opportunities of meeting and conversing with foreigners during my travels, and all agreed that to construct any definite theory about China to-day is scarcely possible. Thus, her relations with Foreign Powers are of quite an exceptional character, and their reality differs greatly from the appearance. The procedure adopted by Western States in their dealings with China, and their attitude of jealousy towards each other, constitute a situation of grave peril. China, on her side, does not appear to have any fixed policy or any definite idea how to deal with her embarrassments. Turning to her domestic affairs, the most superficial observer can see that they too are fraught with danger. It is not an exaggeration to say that the Far-Eastern question is now the Chinese question. Korea's case is comparatively insignificant; it can not be mentioned in the same breath with China's. It is commonly said of China that the problem of reform is responsible for the signal changes that have occurred since September last. I myself did not originally suppose that the question of national reform had assumed such large dimensions in China, though I fully appreciated the imperative necessity of reform. But things have greatly altered, and the question has now entered an acute phase. Looking at the order of the various reforms undertaken, I am not sure that they were calculated to effect a general improvement in the condition of the Chinese empire, and I was not surprised, therefore, to find that they had been interrupted mid-way. China must be reformed. That is beyond doubt. But in a country where the customs of the people, the administrative methods, the laws, the literature, and, in short, everything that goes to make up the life of the nation, have been crystallized by the uninterrupted passage of centuries upon centuries of time, it is not to be supposed that really valuable reforms can be effected in a moment. To attempt to carry into successful operation any large measures of reform, would demand extraordinary ability on the part of the Administration, and would involve something very like a revolution. At the present moment, therefore, there is little hope of China's reform. On the other hand, can her integrity be preserved if things remain as they are? All are agreed that she does not possess either the military organization or the administrative arrangements necessary for the maintenance of a great empire. She is merely leading a precarious existence which derives its vitality chiefly from her antiquity. Can she hope to assert her independence henceforth? Consider the frequent disturbances that occur within her borders and the contingencies to which they may lead. If she once becomes an arena for the exercise of the rivalries between Foreign Powers, there can be no hesitation in affirming that her fate is sealed. I arrive, therefore, at the definite conclusion that a very precarious state of affairs exists in the East, and if you ask me what are the chief factors of danger, I answer that they are numerous. One of the principal is that the Eastern question is not localized, but has come to have an intimate connexion with the problems that concern Western nations in their own spheres. If you look at the telegraphic and journalistic intelligence which we have received about the Fashoda affair and the difficulties that grew out of it between England and France, you will perceive at once that any warlike struggle between the two Powers would immediately have been felt in the Far East. When I was in Shanghai, the British squadron received orders to rendezvous at Wei-hai-wei. Many people said that the step was taken by way of precaution against the danger of some serious anti foreign movement in North China. Was that so? No. The incident was simply one of the phenomena caused by the Fashoda disturbance. In other words, the peril of the situation in Europe had at once made itself felt among British subjects in the Far East. I do not say that an outbreak might not have occurred in Peking demanding the exercise of military force on Great Britain's part. But the assembly of the British Squadron at Wei-hai-wei was not merely a precautionary measure against troubles in China: it was an outcome of the strained relations between Great Britain and France in Africa. As for China, her defensive capacities at present are totally inadequate to preserve her independence, and she is quite without means to deal with a serious crisis should it arise. Any serious complication in her domestic affairs leading to the interference of Foreign States would immediately bring upon the tapis the question of the balance of power between them, and the situation would ultimately enter a phase eminently dangerous to her integrity. A country must be able to manage its domestic affairs properly before it can show a bold front to the world. If it can not control the forces that operate to subvert peace and good order within its own territories, that Foreign Powers will take upon themselves the duty of controlling them is beyond doubt. China's intercourse with foreigners is disfigured by many untoward incidents; burnings of churches, assassinations of missionaries, outrages against personal and property. These troubles, if they assume larger proportions, may at any moment become the cause of a serious crisis in her affairs. Japan, her immediate neighbour, would be the first to feel the effects of such a crisis. What then, should be the line of procedure adopted by our country? Naturally the special circumstances of each case must influence our manner of dealing with it, but, speaking generally, although I am not one of the so-called "strong policy" men, I have no hesitation in saying that unless we are fully prepared to meet all contingencies, we shall find ourselves virtually resourceless in the supreme moment, however strenuous may be our efforts to save the situation. As lovers of our country, we must make it our aim to develop our strength while the opportunity is yet with us. In the case of Korea, the occurrences now reported from Söul are not of sufficient magnitude to constitute a national danger, but if they continue unchecked, they may easily develop grave phases.

Reviewing the situation as a whole, I am disposed to think that with regard to China and the Far East the actual conditions are not such as the Japanese people in general seem to imagine, and I apply this remark alike to the problem of North China and to the Anglo-French problem. Other nations plainly regard China's affairs as having assumed a very precarious character and other nations appear to me to be right. (Here the Marquis entered into an account of his own doings. He said that since the year before last he had not intended to take any further share in the administration, but had altered his intention in deference to the Emperor's commands, and had assumed the responsibility of organizing a Cabinet last January. It had become his duty to propose an increase of the Land Tax, and the result had been a collision with the Diet leading to the dissolution of the Lower House. He had then handed over the Administration to the Constitutional Party, because he supposed that they would be able to achieve what he himself had failed to accomplish, and it had been a bitter disappointment as well as a great surprise to him to learn at Shanghai that the Constitutional Party had broken up and that the Ministry had fallen. Arriving at Nagasaki, however, he had learned with pleasure that the present Cabinet had been formed.) It is inevitable that whatever statesmen assume the direction of the nation's affairs at this juncture, they must encounter great difficulties. I therefore feel it to be my bounden duty to render every assistance in my power, for the fortunes of the country depend largely on the manner of its administration at present. Need I say that I have no hesitation in sacrificing myself if I can in any way promote the interests of the country. I can not tell you how gratified I was to learn that, at such a crisis, a union had been formed between you, gentlemen, and the Cabinet, and it is my most sincere hope that you will work in full harmony. Another dissolution of the House of Representatives would be a calamity of the gravest nature to the country. This is essentially a time calling for concord between the Legislature and the Administration. If the present opportunity be forfeited, no man, let his genius be what it may, will be able to retrieve the situation." (The Marquis then dwelt on the necessity of providing funds to carry out the various enterprises on which the nation had embarked, and declared positively that the Land Tax was the only stable and sound source of revenue. He had not originally been an advocate of increasing the Land Tax, as his record showed, but after coming to deal with national affairs in recent times, he had been forced to conclude that this was the best available resource.) "I venture therefore to hope that, in the country's interests, you will support the Land Tax Bill submitted to the Diet by the Cabinet. History indicates that you were the first to endorse and vote for the post bellum programme. I ask you to complete the task to which you then pledged yourselves. There are among my hearers several gentlemen fully acquainted with the state of affairs in the Treasury, and it is unnecessary that I should offer to them any information about the Indemnity. But I bespeak your patience for a while I give a few figures." (Here the speaker read a statement with reference to the calls that had been made upon the Indemnity, and showed that, in 1899, it would not suffice to meet the demands now in sight). "Such being the case, some method of relieving the financial strain must positively be found. I do not go so far as to assert that an increase of the Land Tax is absolutely inevitable, but I most emphatically allege that, having joined hands with the Cabinet, you are bound to assist it in seeking some exit from the present financial difficulty. The state of affairs now existing is precisely similar to that of which I myself had painful experience, and I can therefore fully sympathise with the Ministers of the Crown, and I venture to think that your solicitude for the country's good will awaken in you a corresponding disposition to sympathy and helpfulness. In the field of commerce the balance of trade has been partially restored, yet the general condition of commerce is distinctly languid. There appears to be a slightly renewed feeling of ease in the money market, but, on the other hand, enterprise is almost paralysed. What we have to do before everything is to consider the necessity of carrying to a conclusion the national undertakings already commenced. I have been absent from Japan for some time, and it is possible that my knowledge of the political situation may appear incomplete, but one thing is beyond all doubt, namely, that without harmony between the Legislature and the Executive, the constitutional system of Government can not be a success. Causes of differences are bound to arise, of course, in connexion with the numerous problems presenting themselves for solution, but it is above all things desirable that the progress of constitutional institutions should not be interrupted by vain discussions. The smooth working of the constitutional system in England is primarily due, I think, to the fact that the English people understand the necessity of subserving individual opinions to the general good. It is your duty to the Constitution, gentlemen, to cultivate a spirit of compromise so that a long existence may be assured to the institutions which it is our happiness to possess."

Mr. Hoshi Toru having thanked Marquis Ito for his address, the company, numbering about 300, sat down to dinner.

THE IDEAS OF LEADING CHINESE STATESMEN.

Lord Li, interviewed by a representative of the Hongkong Daily Telegraph in Peking, was good enough to explain very frankly the reasons that have induced China to throw herself into the arms of Russia and to turn away from England's embraces. During his term of service as Chinese Representative in Tokyo, Lord Li earned the reputation of an able, liberal-minded statesman, and the explanation he now finds of his country's situation comes as a kind of shock. He is satisfied, apparently, to think that helplessness is an excuse for any display of incompetence and pusillanimity. England would not aid China against Japan, therefore China turned to Russia. Did Russia aid her? Yes; she interfered to prevent the annexation of Liaotung by Japan and then annexed it herself. There is nothing in history so splendidly sarcastic as Russia's treatment of China. Russia did not want to have the Japanese in possession of Liaotung. Her access to warm seas must be vid Korea or Liaotung. There were many considerations which militated against the final choice of the former, yet a favorable opportunity to choose the latter did not present itself immediately. All chance of such an opportunity would have disappeared had Japan taken Liaotung, and, moreover, her presence there would have greatly impaired the advantages offered by Korea also as an oceanward route for Russian enterprise. Russia would therefore have been extremely fatuous had she neglected any means of keeping Japan out of Liaotung, and when France and Germany showed themselves willing to play her game to perfection by assisting her to re-write the Shimonoseki Treaty, it was a foregone conclusion that she should avail herself of their extremely obliging cöoperation. Yet Lord Li imagines that Russia acted on that occasion in China's interests; imagines such a thing in the face of subsequent experiences; is actually blind enough to think that China has been befriended by a Power which, having exacted a munificent reward for salving her property, then proceeded to seize the property for herself? If such a story were told in fiction, it would be denounced as inartistic owing to its extreme improbability. Weare not finding fault with Russia. The conscience of a State and the conscience of an individual are totally different things, and although Englishmen may deem it convenient to accuse Russia of moral callousness in her dealings with China, they know very well that she might find precedents for all her acts in the records of Great Britain herself. That is not the point, however. The point is that Lord Li, an intelligent Chinese statesman, professes to regard Russia as China's friend. His estimate of her amity is not a bit disturbed by the events of the past year. In Germany's Kiao-chou coup he finds full excuse for Russia's occupation of Port Arthur and Talien. That very kind friend Russia interprets the duties of friendship to mean that if her friend is despoiled of one portion of his garments by violent folks, she should immediately proceed to despoil him another. Lord Li manages to reconcile that procedure with his ideas of "friend pidjin," and such a feat of mental gymnastics must be quite as entertaining to Russian publicists as it is to all students of human nature. Can we wonder that national helplessness should be China's condition when the intelligence of her statesmen is so terribly befogged? However, it would not be wise to take all these statements of Lord Li's quite literally. He does too glaring injustice to his own shrewdness. To find excuses for the wholesale calamities that his father has brought upon China by recourse to Russia's friendly aid, he does not hesitate to depict the old Vicerey and himself in the light of the naïvest and least astute statesmen that ever assisted to dismember their country. Nor does he hesitate to represent China's heplessness in the most extravagant light. "We had no power to turn Germany out of Kiao-chou." A State with very scanty means of maritime transport, lands three or four hundred men at a point ten thousand miles from its base in the territory of an immense empire containing 300 millions of inhabitants. Yet Lord Li says:—"We had no power to turn them out." Pusillanimity could not be carried beyond that extreme.

We are inclined to think that though Lord Li devoted so many words to proving the wonderful ineptitude of himself and his father—ineptitude which, we take leave to observe, is quite irreconcilable with what the world knows of the two men—, and to exposing the wretchedly invertebrate and cowardly condition of the Chinese empire, the only really significant part of his remarks is the assertion that "England does not want to help China to become a great manufacturing country; has no wish to see China greatly reformed; and wants to keep China down as much as possible." That belief is, at all events, intelligible. It does not tax our imagination quite so severely as does the theory that Earl Li and Lord Li are cursed with immeasurably shallow minds. Plenty of folks pretend to regard England as a schemer against China's industrial development. The doctrine is not generally accepted, being slightly difficult to reconcile with the fact that whatever industrial progress China has hitherto made is due mainly to Britisli initiative. Nevertheless such a faucy might easily present itself to the minds of the two Li if they resemble, even approximately, the portraits that they draw of themselves. England does not wish China to be nationally strong, so, under the guidance of the two Li, China goes to Russia to be deprived of her nationality altogether. It is as though an invalid, finding his physician reluctant to administer an invigorating tonic, applied to a surgeon to be dissected. What is to be the fate of a country whose statesmen labour under such hallucinations? The "open door" policy rests upon the assumption that the house to whic.. access is sought has for its inmates people sensible enough at least to desire that the edifice should not be pulled down altogether. If the Chinese have that much sense, Lord Li manages to conceal the fact most successfully.

A DISSIPATED SECRETARY OF LEGATION.

It is stated that Mr. Ohara Kinzaburo, for many years Secretary of the Japanese Legation in Paris, has been arrested on a charge of misappropriating twenty thousand yen of public money. The story told by the vernacular newspapers is that Mr. Ohara allowed himself to be betrayed into spendthrift habits, the attractions of the French capital proving too much for him, and that he falsified his accounts from time to time until the aggregate of his defalcations reached the above sum. Only recently, however, did the Foreign Office discover the fraud. Mr. Ohara's recall followed immediately, of course, and his arrest was effected on the 11th instant.

On Monday evening at 5.30 a foreign lady living in Tsukiji fell into the river at Irifunecho, Kyobashi, Tokyo, mistaking her way through shortness of sight. A policeman, a jinrikisha coolie, and two boatmen rescued her and she was sent to her residence.

LOSS OF THE "YAYEYAMA-MARU."

On Tuesday (13th) at 1 a.m., a collision occurred between a steamer of the Peninsular and Oriental Company—the Brindisi—and the Japanese steamer Yayeyama Maru, in Moji Bay, with the result that the latter was sunk. No casualties to life or limb are reported. The Yayeyama is a vessel of 1,575 tons (gross). She was built in 1872 by the London and Glasgow Company, and she belongs to Mr. Okazaki Takichi, of Kobe. The P. and O. steamer, which was at anchor at the time, slipped her cables and steamed to Nagasaki for repairs, so it is expected her damages were slight. The Japanese steamer was referred to by several papers as the Yayeyama Kan.

MR. FUKUZAWA'S STUDENTS.

The students and faculty of the Keiogijuku, to the number of about 400, held a friendly meeting in the Maple Club on the 12th instant. Mr. Kamada, the Director of the College, made a speech, in the course of which he stated that the object of the meeting was not to celebrate Mr. Fukuzawa's recovery, but inasmuch as the 12th was Mr. Fukuzawa's birthday, the public can entertain no doubt about the intention of the "Sage of Mita's" pupils in coming together on that day. Contemporaneous meetings of a similar character were held at all the principal places throughout the Empire, so that the affair assumed the character of a national demonstration.

"THE MAGISTRATE."

The Magistrate was played to another full house on Thursday evening, and the funds of the Yokohama General Hospital should benefit considerably. One thing stands out distinctly in connection with The Magistrate, and that is the general excellence of the minor characters. To our way of thinking the players of "secondary parts" seldom get their just meed of praise. Much of their work in ordinary comedies is of the most thankless description, and yet how much of the success of the play really depends upon them. The author of The Magistrate has made opportunities for the lesser lights which were taken full advantage of last evening. The by-play of Sergeant Lugg (Mr. Bramhall), for instance, rises naturally from the few words that fall to him, yet it requires a low comedian of no ordinary capacities to bring it out as he has done. His conception of the part—and we think we can bestow no higher praise—was "to the life." Mr. C. I. Fraser's Wormington, the Magistrate's Clerk at Mulberry-street, was also capital, and his make-up" on the lines of a well-known local official proved very realistic. Miss Poole showed to even better advantage than on the opening night. Miss Morse as Popham, the amorous parlour-maid who found a Vade mecum in Bow Bells, deserves appreciative notice, as does also Mr. W. B. Clayton for his rendering of Wyke, the manservant in the Poskel establishment. Mr. Lias made a most natural Inspector of Police and had an able colleague in Mr. B C. Howard, Constable Harris. Isidore (Mr Parlett) and Achille Blond (Mr. L. Plummer) were highly acceptable in their amusing rôles. The principals, it goes without saying, were all in good form last night, throwing into their several characters all the "go" that makes so completely for success.

THE SITUATION IN CHINA.

THERE is nothing surprising in the fact that fresh complications have occurred in Peking in connexion with the recent outrages against missionaries. We ventured to express our conviction, when the news of the outrages reached Tokyo, that the evasive, perfunctory attitude of the Chinese Government would provoke the direct interference of Foreign Powers. The telegrams now say that Germany threatens to send a force from Kiao-chou to the scene of the outrage in Shantung, and France talks of an expedition to Szechuan viâ Yunnan. The former project is, of course, feasible enough from a military point of view, though the German officials accompanying the troops would find considerable difficulty in effecting anything except a wholesale measure of retaliation. But an expedition from the Red River viâ Yunnan to Szechuan would be a stupendous undertaking, and could not possibly be commenced before April next. It is scarcely credible that France can seriously contemplate anything of the kind. If it were necessary for her to despatch a force to Szechuan to exact reparation for the murder of a missionary, the obvious route would be the Yangtze, which, even if Ichang were the point of debarcation, affords comparatively easy access to Szechuan. If France found it necessary to take that step and were in any difficulty as to means of water transport, she could, of course, count on Great Britain's cō-operation. But the news of her mining designs imparts a new complexion to the affair. Is it credible that she has sought in the murder of one of her missionaries a pretext for demanding mining concessions? Scarcely credible, we think. That would be to reduce Occidental civilization to a burlesque. Of course if it is true, an ominous situation is created, for after all England's talk about the Yangtsze Valley, we can scarcely suppose that she would quietly agree to France's acquiring exclusive mining privileges in Szechuan. Fate seems to be most unhappily disposed towards the relations between England and France. They have already become very precarious in the Valley of the Nile, and it looks as if the Valley of the Yangtsze were now to become a new field of collision.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

The question of transferring 20 million yen from the Indemnity to the Imperial Estates has occupied some journalistic attention, but, on the whole, can not be said to have provoked controversy. Three journals only, the Asahi, the Yorozu Choho, and the Nippon, have ventured to raise their voices against the project; all the rest find words of approval alone. The arguments employed by the opponents of the measure have already been re-produced with sufficient fulness in these columns, and it is scarcely necessary to describe in detail the various suggestions that have been added for the purpose of impuguing the motives of the politicians that were mainly instrumental in pushing the proposal—such suggestions, for example, as that the transfer of so large a sum to the Household Treasurers and its subsequent investment in some form of securities would cause a sudden appreciation of the latter, and thus offer a chance to speculators; or that the whole project is a mere device to provide an exit from the Land-Tax dilemma; or that the intention is to enable the Emperor to make some demonstration in favour of military armaments. There are always people of infinite wisdom who read into every incident schemes and devices written there by their own diseased imagination. The two Houses of the Diet passed with virtual unanimity the Representation embodying the proposal. Absolute unanimity was, indeed, spoken of by the newspapers, but it subsequently transpired that three members in the Lower House did not rise in their places when a show of hands was called for, and some capital is made of the fact by the opponents of the project. They aver, with a certain show of truth, that on such an occasion a member is under immense moral pressure to vote in the affirmative; that one dissenter might, perhaps, be explained on the ground of eccentricity, but that three indicate the existence of a feeling which, under ordinary circumstances, would probably have given the "noes" a majority. It can scarcely be affirmed, however, that the opponents of the step have held their ground. They showed firmness at the outset, but their voices ultimately ceased to be audible. The last suggestion is that His Majesty should accept the money and then hand it over to the Government to form a fund for the assistance of primary education. From the time when the Indemnity began to be paid, claims to some portion of it were strenuously urged by educationists, but they never succeeded in obtaining a hearing, and if the Emperor now showed his appreciation of their needs by appropriating this sum of 20 million yen to their uses, the gratitude of the nation would be unbounded. The Hochi Shimbun is the author of that suggestion.

Very much greater interest has been aroused by the problem of the Land Tax. This may be said to have become the political issue of the hour. The Progressists, seeing in it their only chance of defeating the Liberals, have organized a strenuous opposition, and are actively canvassing for supporters. Their newspaper organs of course write in strong terms. The Yomiuri is conspicuously uncompromising. It professes to think that the fate of the Clan Statesmen is involved in the problem. Cabinet after Cabinet has been wrecked by it, and if it be now employed as a weapon to overthrow the Yamagata Ministry, the knell of the Clan Statesmen will have been finally rung. Other journals discuss the matter more moderately, but it is significant that the Mainichi Shimbun, which used to be a staunch advocate of increasing the tax, has now so far changed its views as to maintain that until the military armaments are reduced to the point indicated by the nation's resources, there should be no increase of taxation whatever. In short, the Mainichi's contention is that the finances never can be placed on a stable footing until the excessive dimensions of the military expansion programme are cut down, and that it is folly to talk of financial adjustment while the sole root of the trouble is left untouched. There are symptoms that the latter view is acquiring strength, journalistically at all events. It has two strong advocates in the Asahi and the Nippon. The former thinks that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance showed plain inconsistency in the language they addressed to the House of Representatives, for while they avowed themselves opposed to any temporizing patchwork, they at the same time declared their allegiance to the post-bellum programme, and so long as that is pursued, it will be necessary to patch and tinker the finances perpetually. The Nippon takes the same line. It finds that whatever additions be made to the taxes, the result, so far as financial adjustment is concerned, must be like dropping water on a burning stone. All predictions of finality in the matter of military expenditure have been contradicted by events. The more the nation spends, the more it has to spend. Appropriations are now demanded for fortifying Tsushima, Kelung, and the Pescadores, and for completing the military organization in Hokkaido. Such works may be necessary, but why were they not included in previous schemes? Why was the country assured that if it made the effort demanded of it in 1896, no new outlays need be anticipated? The fact is that by far the larger portion of the Indemnity has been spent upon armaments. Very little has gone to public works and none at all to education. There can be no certainty that further expenditures will not be demanded by the Army Authorities at any moment, and, if they are, the Government will certainly consent. The first step towards financial adjustment is to stop that endless drain. Strange to say, although the Liberal Party as a whole seems disposed to support the Cabinet, its principal organ, the Jimmin, adopts a tone of uncompromising hostility towards Land-Tax increase, and calls upon the Party not to depart from its avowed policy. The Liberal leaders, in a conference with the Ministers, urged that reliance should be placed, for the present, on revenue derived from sugar, tobacco, and sake. The Ministry declined to adopt that course, and thereby sacrificed the recently established entente. There is no longer any cōoperation between the Cabinet and the Party, according to the Jimmin, and the latter should stoutly maintain its position. The Jimmin, however, has always been hostile to the union. It need scarcely be said that the Nichi Nichi, the Kokumin, the Shogyo Shimpo, the Keisai Zasshi, and so forth argue in the strongest and most convincing manner in favour of increasing the Land Tax. The Jiji is, as usual, moderate. It has been an unswerving advocate of the Sake Tax alone, but its advice now is that the Land-Tax Bill, having been definitely determined by the Cabinet, should be passed, if possible. But should the measure unfortunately fail to obtain the House's endorsement, the Cabinet, instead of passing a sentence of dissolution and thus sacrificing the whole Budget as well as renewing the reign of chaos, should quietly accept its defeat, and turn to the Sake Tax as a source of additional revenue.

The Mainichi Shimbun continues its campaign against the abuses of the time. One of its latest articles on the subject contains a vehement attack upon extra-marital relations. It refers to the disgrace which attaches in the Occident to all breaches of the moral code such as those committed by Professor Koch and the Duke of Devonshire, and it alleges that in Japan escapades of that kind are regarded as fashionable and elegant. Chapter and verse are given by our contemporary. It openly mentions the name of a danseuse who for eight thousand yen became the companion of a leading merchant, and the name of another who for ten thousand bestowed her charms on a well-known scientist, the gentlemen also being designated. We do not feel justified in following the Mainichi into details, but will merely notice its inference that, if leaders in the Japanese world of wealth and thought show little respect for morality, the condition of the rank of file must be very miserable. In short, the Japanese "gentleman" (shinshi) would not circulate as such in any civilized country. He is debased currency, a kind of chopped dollar, without any value outside his own locality.

In another article the Mainichi attacks the Diet. It recalls the great expectations that were connected with the Diet originally; how it was expected to work legislative wonders for the country and be a wholesale corrector of abuses. But it has proved a complete disappointment. At the outset it gave some promise of fulfilling the nation's hopes, and, if it had progressed in that manner for ten years, it would have been an object of pride and satisfaction to-day. Very soon, however, it entered the downward grade, and thenceforth its descent was uninterrupted. Subserviency, self-interest, sacrifice of principles to profit, apostacy—these became the ingredients of the parliamentary atmosphere. The distribution of administrative appointments came to be discussed and determined at tea-houses—places of assignation—and every kind of unprincipled practice found ready disciples among the members, who, for the rest, are generally ignorant persons, quite incapable of comprehending the measures submitted to them for discussion.

Under the heading of "military independence" the Fiji Shimpo strongly urges that Japan should endeavour to become her own shipbuilder whatever preliminary sacrifices the effort might entail. To that end it recommends an agreement with some foreign firm in the nature of the arrangement recently discussed between the Russian Government and the Thames Iron Works. Foreign capital and foreign expert experience might be obtained without much difficulty, and although the cost of vessels built in Japan would, for a long time, be greater than the cost of similar vessels obtained abroad, that objection would be only temporary, and, at all events, should not be considered weighty in comparison with the immense advantage of developing competence to be independent.

The present lines of cleavage between political parties are declared by the Nippon to have lost all practical value. The Progressists, the Liberals, the National Unionists, and so on stand apart merely from habit. They could not possibly translate their differentiating doctrines into intelligible language. That is one of the great obstacles in the path to party government. Until parties are based on clearly defined principles they can not possess any stability. The time has come to pull down partitions which have ceased to be tangible, and to re group politicians under banners with legible and comprehensible legends. An excellent line of division now offers in the increase of the Land Tax. Let the opponents of the measure pass into one camp, without reference to their past affinities, and its supporters into another. One would infer from this suggestion that the Nippon expects the Land-Tax question to remain unsettled for many years to come. To us it appears that a more unstable basis for party division could scarcely be conceived.

The extraordinary sensitiveness shown by the Japanese in all matters relating to the Sovereign is strongly condemned by the Jimmin. The tendency of the time is to make the Emperor a pretext for political movements of every kind. A Minister of State was attacked because he spoke of the Chinese as a people with republican instincts. The other day, the people of Shizuoka accused an unpopular Governor of disrespect to the Throne because he issued a notification on a national holiday. Politicians watch each other's utterances keenly, knowing that if they can detect anything construable as disrespectful to the Emperor, they hold a winning card. The effect of such extravagance will ultimately be to impair the prestige of the Throne. In truth nothing could be less respectful than the conduct of men who use the Sovereign's name as gamblers use dice. These remarks of the Jimmin's contrast curiously with the fact that the first impulse was given to the habit of fukei-ron by the attack that the Liberals made upon Mr. Ozaki Yukio.

The Tokyo Asahi thinks that the two reforms most needed by China are a reform of her literature and a reform of her military and naval systems. The former, however, must be a matter of years, whereas the latter can not wait. What should be done, therefore, is to entrust to Japan the task of re-organizing the Army, and to Great Britain the same duty with regard to the Navy. "Japan has a Gordon, and there are plenty of Langs in England."

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Soshi bushi (Soshi's Song) by YONEJIRO SUZUKI; Tokyo, Jujiya, Ginza.

THE meaning of the above title is the "Soshi's Song," a title which will probably suggest to our readers the idea of an ode advocating stalwart conservatism in its least attractive form. None of us have learned to love the Soshi, or even to tolerate him, and we have not the smallest desire to hear him singing songs or otherwise "occupying the floor." Nevertheless it has been reserved for this truculent Soshi to spring a soft surprise on us, for not only does he now proclaim his versified sentiments to the world through the medium of æsthetically truité crêpe paper and tenderly coloured illustrations, but the sentiments themselves, when carefully examined, are found to be of the most liberal and pacific description. In fact the Soshi, as represented by Mr. Suzuki Yonejiro, has fully recognised the error of his former ways, and has now become an orderly and docile member of society. It is true that the recognition has involved considerable sacrifice, for whereas he was once a roistering blade, ready to place his right arm at the service of any redresser of wrongs or subverter of rights, he has now become a milk carrier, a newsvendor, or a street-minstrel. Mr. Suzuki is finely frank. He does not claim a particle of romantic chivalry for the Soshi. He admits that this "stalwart" was the product simply of over-elevated ambition and disproportionate opportunity. Young men, misled by the mirage reflected on provincial skies from the new civilization of the great cities, turned their faces towards the strange light, believing that fortune, in some guise or other, there awaited the resolute seeker, just as the rustic of classical times believed that a mine of gold lay at the base of the rainbow's arch. His equipment for the struggle in the cities, according to Mr. Suzuki, was ignorance of the world, "general lowness of principles," instability of character," and absence of all family control. If, carrying such a cargo, he steered into the wrong port, can we greatly wonder? The truth is that there are in modern Japan many things which elicit the foreign observer's unqualified condemnation and betray him into sweepingly adverse judgments, chiefly because he forgets the conditions under which they occur; forgets the revolution which, thirty years ago, shook the Japanese social fabric to its very foundations and still visits it with tremors and disturbances. Modern Japan may be compared to a river in flood. She has received so many affluents from abroad that the stream of her national life has become swollen almost beyond the capacity of its channel, and a good deal of impurity and rubbish, which would otherwise have lain hidden in the depths, has been forced to the surface. The Soshi may be considered a part of these dregs. He went swirling along for a time, with natural accompaniment of collision and frothings, but he seems to have now sunk even below his original level in the river's deepened channel. The theatrical stage offered a saving ledge to a few of his number. There they found a chance which they had not foreseen and which they utilized successfully. But the bulk have taken refuge in menial pursuits, and are apparently reconciled to the failure of their ambitions, for it is an essential part of the Japanese character to show a brave front to adversity. Mr. Suzuki Yonejiro tells the story of the Soshi in a short song, set to music and framed in a collection of pretty pictures printed in colours on crêpe. It is a dainty volume and it ought to find a ready market now that Christmas is in sight. The song can scarcely be called verse. The writer's ideas of rhyme and rythm are still incoate. But his sentiments are excellent, and he has derived remarkable aid from his brush and decorative genius—for he seems to be himself the artist as well as the poet—and from the liberality and enterprise of his publishers, Messrs. Jujiya and Company. We quote a few of the verses, not because they are the writer's nearest approximation to poetry, but because they furnish a good index to his sentiments:—

Now Japan is opened up,
Foreigners may come and go
Where they please within the realm
Passports they no longer need!
No longer need!
And at last our country dear
Stands acknowledged peer
By the nations all whose power
Once her haughty spirit curbed.
Brightly shines the glorious sun,
Yukwai! Yukwai!

If you come to Nippon now
You may see, where'er you will,
How the Soshi, bold and brave,
Once so troublesome a crew,
Troublesome a crew,
Earn their rice and "cool their minds,"
By dramatic art!
In the theatre of the Soshi.
"Welcome to our foreign friends,
Seems to beam from every eye,
And again this song is heard,"
Yukwai! Yukwai!

It will be observed that Mr. Suzuki uses ryhmes when they occur to him and dispenses with them when they don't come, thereby showing a fine independent spirit. But what are we to say of the conception that betrays a Japanese literateur into writing such doggrel, and of the judgment that allows a Japanese business-man to publish it? In such matters the Japanese want foreign advice badly. If a foreigner were to write Japanese poetry and publish it in a magnificently illustrated and expensively got up volume, they would regard him as a slightly demented person, and his own countrymen would take the same view of his conduct. But the converse of the case does not appear to suggest itself to the Japanese. They seem to imagine that they can write English prose and even English poetry in such a manner as to win the applause of Englishmen. The Indian baboo used to have a monopoly of that sort of misconception, but he has been deprived of it by the Japanese. It would be very false kindness on our part not to tell Mr. Suzuki and his publisher that while the illustrations and binding of this little volume may justly be called beautiful, the letter-press is a mere burlesque, wholly unworthy of such setting or, indeed, of being printed at all.

Classical Tales of Old Japan, by Y. TAKENOBU; Tokyo, Japan Times Office.

MR. TAKENOBU, literary editor of the Japan Times, has just published a volume entitled "Classical Tales of Old Japan." It contains twelve stories, which, as he truly says, "form a part of the life of the nation." It can not be doubted that in such stories—some of which are true while others represent their writers' ideas of what ought to be true—we find materials for constructing a far juster conception of Japanese character than a mere study of every-day traits can furnish. Of course the tales are not all new to foreign readers. Benkei and Yoshitsune at the Ataka Gate; Akoya's ordeal by koto; the death of Matsuo's little son, which forms the basis of one of Japan's greatest histrionic tragedies, the Tera koya; the Saga Brothers, and so on—all these are familiar enough, though they never can become hackneyed. Mr. Takenobu tells the stories in a straightforward style, without any embroidery, and, as a matter of course, his versions are true in every detail to Japanese traditions. He has been assisted by the Rev. Arthur Lloyd, whose revision has done much for the English, though Mr. Takenobu himself is an English scholar of no mean skill. Neither the author not the reviser, however, seems to have hadsufficient timefor careful proofreading. Several typographical errors have escaped attention which is a pity in the case of such a prettily illustrated and well got up little volume. Mr. Takenobu promises the public more of these stories, and we trust that he will be able to keep the promise.

Roden's Corner, by HENRY SEXTON MERRIMAN, Macmillan's Colonial Library; Yokohama, Messrs. Kelly and Walsh, Ltd.

MR. MERRIMAN is one of the few novelists of these days that one can read with any satisfaction. The fact arises, it may perhaps seem unkind to say, almost as much from his negative as his positive qualities. He is not neurotic, not unduly flippant, not ponderously incomprehensible, not at all nasty, and above all not given to sex problems. He is free from that mania of preaching to which the English literary man has ever been a victim, and which, tolerable as it might have been from men who had some message to deliver, is unutterably tiresome in the present age of non-conviction. Nothing is more irritating than a sermon without a gospel behind it. Mr. Merriman, too, writes English that can be understood by Englishmen. He does not seek to establish a reputation for profundity by dint of being incomprehensible, or to coin cheap epigrams at the expense of common sense. To find these qualities in an author of 1898—in times when Miss Marie Corelli is a literary goddess—is truly a relief. On the positive side, Mr. Merriman may be admitted to possess an attractive, pointed style, and an ability to tell a story interestingly. If he would conquer the tendency to a "scrappy" manner of presenting his plot from which all end-of-the-century novelists suffer, and discard the use of little tags and scraps of obvious French conversation, which come in irritatingly here and there, his books would be even more readable than they are at present. However, one is always certain of finding in his work a fund of quiet cleverness and inoffensive humour, and that alone is much to be thankful for.

"Roden's Corner" is a story of that organised folly and inhumanity which is generally known as charity. We have progressed since the days of Mrs. Jellyby and Borria-boola-gha. Our charitable people—people, as Mr. Merriman aptly says, with a great desire to do good, and astonishingly sparse opportunities of doing it—have ceased to devote themselves to sending blankets and top boots to the interesting cannibals of tropical islands, and have devoted themselves to more practically mischievous aims. "Roden's Corner" is an example. London society is interested in a scheme for the benefit of malgamite workers. Malgamite is a necessary ingredient in the making of high class paper, and its manufacture is one of the deadliest of the unhealthy industries. One Van Holzen, a foreign savant, has discovered a means of making the trade practically innocuous, and proposes, with the aid of Percy Roden, a financial genius who has seen hard times and wants to see them no more, to establish a model factory which shall be, instead of a centre of disease and death, a contented happy colony of healthy workers. Society is interested, and particularly one Lord Ferriby and his family. Funds are subscribed largely on the appeal of his lordship, the works are started, batches of workmen are attracted on the promise of high wages and a share of the profits, and the undertaking commences under happy auspices at Scheveningen, near the Hague, that "pleasantest village in Europe" of Lord Chesterfield. One Tony Cornish, a nephew of the philanthropist Ferriby, throws himself into the scheme heartily enough, and it succeeds. The malgamite secret enables the product to be produced not only innocuously, but at a vastly cheaper rate than by old methods. Other manufacturers are threatened with ruin, and agitate against what they regard as a monstrous monopoly. But the charity goes on its way, making enormous profits, and finally its basis, on the suggestion of the financier and Van Holzen, is turned into what is practically a limited liability company. Then Cornish begins to find out what had been suspected by others. Deaths are more numerous at the new factory than under the ordinary processes; though, however, efforts are made to keep the fact a secret. Van Holzen's great secret is simply a cheaper and deadlier way of producing the malgamite, humanely abandoned by a tacit consent by other manufacturers. The great charity is simply a great "corner" designed to enrich the principal promoters, who have been clever enough to obtain their capital for nothing. Lord Ferriby is informed, but gracefully allows the heads of the concern to present a large sum to his bankers, not of course as hush-money, but as a recognition of his services. Cornish and others, on the contrary, feel that they cannot in honour be the accomplices in practically a system of wholesale murder at a profit. And then follows a struggle of plot and counter-plot, intrigue and counter-intrigue, a batch of love complications, and a dramatic catastrophe for which we must refer readers to the book itself. The incidents are exciting and narrated with force and conviction. It is impossible for the most hardened reader not to feel a shudder over the description of the terrible scientist Van Holzen's attempt to murder Cornish scientifically by means of carbonic acid gas. There is, as we say, a love interest in the book, but to our mind Mr. Merriman is much truer in his grasp of masculine than of feminine character. There are one or two men in the book who are true to the life—real men of an interesting generation—but the women, as a rule, leave no impression behind them. There is only one—a shrewd, up-to-date, bicycling, no-nonsense maiden of eighteen—whom we really know. But when we look back at the great writers and remember the ghastly feebleness of Dickens's female characters—whenever he ventured outside of Mrs Nickleby, Mrs. Micawber, and Sarah Gamp—and think of the utterly unconvincing portraits of Thackeray's "good" women—by the side of whom Becky Sharp, with all her wickedness, charms—we need not throw a stone at Mr. Merriman. He has given us a book that is clever, clean, and readable, and amid the multitude of dull and dirty books which the publishers unpityingly foist upon us there is much to be thankful for in that.

MARQUIS ITO ON CHINA.

A social gathering arranged by the business men of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, the Tokyo Commercial and Industrial Association, and the Finance Investigation Society, was held, according to the Nichi Nichi, at 2 p.m. on the 11th instant at the Imperial Hotel. Messrs. Shibusawa and Masuda received the guests, among whom were the Premier, Marquis Yamagata; and other Ministers of State—Marquis Saigo, Count Matsukata, Viscount Katsura, Viscount Aoki, and Viscount Kiyoura, Baron Kuki and Iwasaki, and over 270 business men. At 3.23 p.m. Marquis Ito entered the hall amid acclamations, and Mr. Shibusawa, on behalf of members of the associations above mentioned, addressed the meeting as follows:—

Marquis Ito, with his profound knowledge and public spirit, has investigated the state of affairs in China, and any remarks that he may present to us about our neighbours can scarcely fail to benefit the commercial and industrial community at large. Any information that he may give will help to guide us in our trade with China, and may dispel the gloomy clouds now lying before us in connection with the financial problem. The present meeting is held with the object of obtaining such information from the Marquis. We are much pleased that Marquis has accepted our request, and have to express our sincere gratitude for his kindness.

Marquis Ito then rose. He began his speech by intimating that after his failure in politics in June last he came to a resolution to give up for a time all thoughts about domestic politics, and undertake a tour in China. But the tour so made, was not of such grand dimensions as had been represented. He was not in possession of information such as would satisfy the wishes of the gentlemen present. He would, however, draw their particular attention to one point, namely that he had been treated with cordial hospitality in every part of China and Korea where he had had the pleasure of journeying. Leaving aside for a moment all comments on Korea, the Marquis described China as an extensive country full of industries and populated by a laborious people. China, he remarked, began holding intercourse with the outside world much earlier than Japan did, and was renowned for the extreme frugality of her people. That she had fallen into her present condition was attributable partly to her peculiar laws and customs, but more especially to financial embarassment. She had a number of great statesmen, men of talent, such as Li Hung-chang, Chang Chih-tung, and others, who were all familiar with the principles of modern civilization. These gentlemen agreed with the Marquis on the subject of reform, but they were not able, from want of money, to carry out their projects. The people had accumulated wealth to a certain extent, but it was no easy task for the Government to collect it. Even the indemnity in connection with the war of the 27th and 28th year of Meiji had to be raised by recourse to foreign loans negotiated on the security of the customs revenue. The salt tax and other taxes levied in the valley of the Yangtszekiang had also been placed under the control of Sir Robert Hart, the Chief English Commissioner of Customs. China, under the present circumstances, should have an organised Army and Navy. In the existing state of affairs the Powers of Europe might not allow each other to take any radical measures for the dismemberment of China, but they had shown a marked disposition to enter into competition with each other for power and profit in the ancient Empire. The source of danger which still lay concealed was serious; the position was as perilous as that of a number of eggs piled one upon another; the whole system might at any moment come toppling to the ground. China had fallen into a rut of obstinate adherence to old-world ideas. The late war had roused her from her sleep, but it was to be regretted that when she awoke, she found herself financially in an extremely embarrassed condition, so that nothing in the way of reform could effectually be carried out. The foundation of a state virtually lay in the strength of its finances. The Marquis then passed on to show that the foreign trade of Japan with China ought to be encouraged. He read (from a document which we shall subsequently translate) the main points of information collected during his sojourn in China. In the first place he referred to the financial distress; secondly, to the three classes of the people—gentry, nobles, and commonalty; thirdly, to the facilities enjoyed by Japan for carrying on her commerce in the north of China, and finally to the different divisions of territory with which commercial relations might be established. The central part (the territory along the Yangtsze-kiang, including Shanghai) had been opened to commerce from an early period, and abounded in wealthy Chinese with whom commercial cōoperation was absolutely necessary. The Southern part (Canton district), which was also opened very early, would be a field of keen competition by Japanese with the Chinese merchants. The Marquis then expressed, in animated terms, deep solicitude with regard to the present condition of Japan. He urged the necessity of consolidating the foundations of the national finance to keep pace with the steady development of the resources of the country. He pledged himself to do anything in his power for the support of the financial policy formulated by the present Ministry. He strongly condemned party broils as extremely prejudicial to the interests of the State, especially when an urgent national problem presented itself for solution. The administration of the country's affairs ought to be entrusted to young and vigorous statesmen who had acquired their knowledge and ability by a regular course of study. In the case of an exigency like the present, the basis of finance could not be consolidated except by the adoption of the programme determined by the present Cabinet. The members of the two Houses, as well as the business-men at large, should devote their utmost energies to assisting the Cabinet in the consummation of the financial work which it has just begun. The Marquis concluded his speech amid vehement applause.

Mr. Ozaki, as a representative of the members present, expressed his thanks to the Marquis, adding that he entertained the latter's view in regard to the proposed increase of the land tax.

THE IMPERIAL DIET.

FRIDAY, DEC. 9TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

A FORMOSAN DEBATE.

The House of Peers met at 10.10 a.m., and proceeded to the first reading of a Government bill for extending the operative period of Law No. 63 of the year 1896 until the 31st of March, 1902. This is a law contering special legislative powers on the Governor General of Formosa, and its period of operation was originally limited to April 30th, 1899. the Government's forecast being that, by that time, Formosa would be ready to come under the same system of laws and regulations as that applied in Japan proper.

Mr. Goto, Chief of the Civil Government Bureau in Formosa, introduced the bill in a brief speech, explaining that the new territory was not yet in a condition to be governed by laws of the nature now operative in other parts of the Empire. Pressed for a fuller explanation he entered into a detailed account of the manners and customs of the inhabitants of Formosa, and the peculiar usages which differentiated them from other peoples. He declared that some parts of the island were regular haunts of bandits, and that no ordinary system of administration could be applied there.

Mr. Izawa Shuji, who has had opportunities of intimately observing Formosan conditions, said that, as he understood, the terrible disorder prevailing in Formosa was in great part due to abuse of the legislative powers. If what Mr. Goto had told them was correct, in other words if the Formosans were not fit to be brought under a definite system of laws and regulations, how did it happen that the Civil Code and the Criminal had been made operative there during the present year? According to newspaper accounts, the local and fiscal administration of the island was fully elaborated, and the country might be said to be enjoying "piping times of peace." How were they to believe, if things were so happily ordered, that a definite system of laws and regulations could not be put into operation?

Mr. Goto's answers were somewhat obscure, but Mr. Izawa did not press the question, and the bill was entrusted to a Special Committee.

HOKKAIDO.

The next bill on the Order was an amendment of the law relating to the management of unreclaimed land in Hokkaido. According to the law as it now stands, free grants of lands may be made to settlers, but, if the recipient of such a grant desires to register his title, which without registration does not possess validity, he is charged a registration fee which often amounts to more than the present value of the land. Moreover, the fees of registering land-titles in the Tochi-Daicho are the same in Hokkaido as in the main island, which is plainly improper. Therefore the Government proposes to amend the law in the sense of dispensing altogether with registration fees in the case of lands obtained by free grant, and reducing them greatly in other cases. The bill was handed to a Special Committee.

MILITARY SECRETS.

Viscount Tani, as chairman of a special committee, reported favourably on the bill for the better protection of military secrets and the bill for extending the court-martial system to Formosa. The Committee recommended a few verbal amendments in the former measure.

The House passed both bills through their Second and Third readings, and rose at noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives did not sit, the various committees alone assembling for the examination of the measures entrusted to them.

SATURDAY, DEC. 10TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The Committees alone of the Upper House assembled.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.10 p.m.

QUESTIONS.

Mr. Nemoto presented a Question about the salaries of diplomatic officials en desponibilité. He contended that no valid reasons existed for giving pay to such officials, and he asked for a statement of the motives influencing the Government.

Mr. Tanaka Shozo presented a Question on his favorite subject, the Ashiwo copper-mine pollution. He declared that the losses suffered by the inhabitants of the districts to which the poisonous products of the mine had access aggregated 40 million yen, if reduced to money. The Government denied the correctness of that figure, but he wanted to know something about the investigations forming the bases of the Government's denials. For his part he maintained the absolute correctness of his figures, and declared unhesitatingly that the unfortunate people of the infected districts did not receive the protection to which they were entitled by the Constitution. Mr. Tanaka very soon talked himself into his wonted mood of excitement. He denounced the whole body of officials as utterly heartless. They were ready enough to turn their feet towards Oiso and Kamakura and other places where cool breezes and fair landscapes might be enjoyed, but they never thought of paying a visit to regions where men and women were suffering cruel hardships through administrative neglect. They were a pack of national brigands, &c. The worthy member descended from the rostrum amid the laughter of the House.

THE GIFT TO THE EMPEROR.

Mr. Kuribara Riyoichi, Chairman of the Budget Committee, presented a report showing that the Committee had unanimously approved a Supplementary Budget presented by the Government proposing that a sum of 20 million yen be taken from the Indemnity and included in the Crown Estates. The Supplementary Budget had been compiled in consequence of Representations passed by both Houses of the Diet a few days previously. He moved that the Order of the Day be changed for the purpose of discussing the Budget at once.

Leave having been given to change the Order, the Supplementary Budget was passed without discussion or dissent.

NEW BILLS.

The Order of the Day was then taken and the following bills were handed to Special Committees:—

1. A Government Bill for amending the language of the Leaf Tobacco Monopoly Law, in the sense of empowering the Government to extend its monopoly to imported tobacco.

2. A Government Bill for amending the Land Tax Regulations, in the sense of raising the rate of the Tax from 2½ per cent. to 4 per cent., provided that, simultaneously with the operation of the amended Regulations, the taxable value of the land should be re-assessed in districts where inequalities of incidence were apparent.

This Bill was entrusted to a Special Committee of 27, nominated by the President.

3. A Government Bill for re-assessing the taxable value of Land. The statement of reasons appended to the Bill explained that although certain amendments of assessment had been made in 1880 and 1889, there was still considerable inequality of incidence calling for correction. Three factors are employed in assessing the taxable value: they are, the price of the koku (kokudai); the amount of the yield (shukaku), and the rate of interest (riritsu). It was proposed now to determine the value of the koku by taking the average market price for ten years, beginning with 1887. As to the estimate of yield, it should be reduced whenever

THE GREAT FUR CASE.

IN H.B.M. COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before H. S. WILKINSON Esq., Judge, sitting with a Jury.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 9TH, 1898.

REGINA V. CHARLES EMIL LEOPOLD.

On the Court assembling the Judge said he had had copies of the indictment printed for the convenience of the Jury, and he thought it desirable that they should be handed them.

Counsel concurred.

Johann Andreas Harmssen was then recalled. He said he had searched since the previous day for the original of the telegram from the N. D. Lloyd to Ahrens & Co., but had been unable to find it. Before the interview he had had with Leopold at the Hospital witness was engaged in searching for documents connected with the fur transactions. He examined the manifests of the voyages of the Hohenzollern from December to April. He searched for the captain's copies of bills of lading referring to the furs. He found several copies of bills of lading in Leopold's desk. He could not say that he found all the copies produced on his first search, but certainly a part of them. They were found in one of Leopold's drawers. He looked in the drawers because he could not find any trace of furs shipped on the manifests. He enquired of the Japanese in the shipping office, and in consequence of what he was told he looked for them in the drawers and found them there. He afterwards made enquiries of the accused on the same subject. After the conversation in the hospital he found out that the bills of lading found must represent Captain's copies, although they had not the usual stamps and checks. Witness compared the captain's copies produced with the bills of lading sent to the bank, and stated that they corresponded in all essential particulars. In the course of the office routine the Captain's copies should have gone forward with the steamer, and ought to have been delivered in London to the agents of the N. D. Lloyd.

Mr. Litchfield was about to put in the manifests of December to April when His Honour, intervening, said evidence of the manifests was admissible, but were the manifests themselves admissible evidence? It was a purely technical question, but he threw it out for their consideration.

Mr. Lowder said it was in evidence that the accused was in charge of this department, and his learned friend would prove that it would be his duty as head of the department to see that the bills of lading were compared.

His Honour—Have we got that in, Mr. Lowder, Mr. Lowder—No, not yet.

His Honour thought it would be convenient to to lay the foundations of the evidence first.

Witness then stated that accused was in charge of the shipping office, but he could not give any answer to the question whether the manifest book was under the charge of the accused. He could say, however, that when the steamer was despatched and the manifest was prepared Leopold and himself usually compared the entries with the Captain's copies.

Mr. Litchfield asked if witness had searched the manifests in the book, and found traces in the manifests of shipments of furs bearing marks and numbers L I in a Diamond 46 to 47.

M. Terry objected. He said a proper foundation must be laid for such a question. It did not appear that it was the duty of the accused to make the manifests up, and the previous day a Japanese witness had stated that he made up the manifests and Leopold only looked them through afterwards. Also, he must object that these were not the original but only copies of the manifests.

His Honour—The evidence goes to show that the accused has read over these. What would it be that he read, Mr. Harmssen—those in the book or what?

Witness—They are all checked.

His Honour—But is it the one that is kept in the office or the one that would go to London.

Witness—They are read before they are sent off the night before the departure of the steamer, and this copy is taken.

His Honour (to Mr. Litchfield)—It appears that the original was compared by the accused, and these were a copy of what was compared. Do you want to consider that question? Do you want to put them in? I have no doubt the evidence can be got in, but what is the way?

Mr. Lowder (to witness): Then will you say whether the original is in this country or not?

Witness—This may be the original. They were all in manifold writing, and not in copying ink.

Mr. Lowder suggested that they should take the evidence of the witness without putting the documents in.

His Honour—You need not produce them at all, it appears to me. You are ready to produce them if they are called for. All the evidence we want is the evidence with regard to searching for them. Do you object to that, Mr. Terry?

Mr. Terry said to prove that a thing was not in a written document followed the same rule as proving that a thing was in it. The only evidence was the document itself. A written document was primary evidence of the fact that a certain entry was or was not contained in it. When it was required to prove that a certain entry was or was not contained in a certain document the only primary evidence was the document itself.

His Honour—The inclination of my opinion is towards the admissibility of this.

Mr. Lowder—We could not tell which was the original document in this case.

His Honour—At the present moment my opinion favours your contention, but if you think it better to wait till the afternoon and will then produce any authority on one side or the other I shall be happy to hear it.

Mr. Lowder—We shall accept your Honour's suggestion.

Mr. Terry—There are two distinct questions involved. First, is a certain statement contained in the written document? That must be first proved. Secondly, suppose the fact to be that the statement is not contained in the written document, is that fact itself evidence in itself?

His Honour—The point seems to me the proof of a negative, and I am quite prepared without discussion at all to hear the statement of Mr. Harmssen that he has made all enquiries he can and the result of those enquiries. I don't think you can say that that is subject to any objection.

Witness was then asked if he had compared the blue shipping forms from December to April, and could find among them any receipt by the Pier Traffic and Lighter Company for 10 cases of furs marked LI in a diamond above ▮ I and numbered 46 to 55.

Mr. Terry said he made the same objection. He said it was not quite in the same form, because it was here a question whether any written document existed.

His Honour—Can you sustain any objection to that at all, Mr. Terry?

Mr. Terry said if this document were in existence it would not be evidence against the accused It would be in the nature of a narrative and only hearsay evidence.

His Honour said the question whether a particular document had been found was one of the commonest questions put with regard to many cases in which questions of the knowledge of any body as to documents was concerned.

Mr. Tserry—That is perfectly true if the document when it is found would in itself be evidence.

His Honour—The question is simply this. It would be evidence for something and the question is what it is for. It would be very important evidence if it were found.

Mr. Terry—My contention is that the document itself would not be evidence when found. Of course if it is decided that it would be evidence this question would be admissible. If the document however, as I contended, is hearsay evidence the question would not, I submitted, be admissible.

His Honour—I am prepared to take the answer.

The question was repeated to the witness, and he replied that he had been unable to find the receipt in question. He gave the same answer with reference to other dates. Witness was then taken through a number of other documents, bills of lading Pier Company's receipts, and insurance policies, and examined as to the various signatures, marks, and entries on them. He also described the routine of making out insurance policies.

The adjournment for tiffin was taken here.

On the Court reassembling Mr. Litchfield said with reference to the question of manifests he had been of opinion and was still of opinion that the question might be properly put, but he had decided after consideration not to press the question.

The witness Harmssen, recalled, said he had in court manifests from December to April. The exhibit produced was written by witness at the hospital at the dictation of Leopold. It was the rough notes of the list of assets already published.

Witness read the list, translating several entries in German, as follows:—

	yen
Saw Mills	...100,000
Godown land Shiogacho	... 15,000
Nakamura	... 10,000
Yoshida Shinden (or Yoshihama-cho) ...	1,000
Japanese houses	3,000
Paper Manufactory Tokyo	4,000
Furs and general merchandise... ...	... 60,000
London	30,000
Land and property	...100,000
Samuel Samuel & Co.
Shares	8000 & 1,500

There was also the word "Klondyke," some words witness could not read well; the word "Kildoyle," and a German word he translated as advance. The list was written at the interview of Mr. Hoffman and himself with Leopold. Leopold said they were his assets. Witness did not think Leopold said anything about where these furs and merchandise were, but witness certainly understood that the merchandise was in his possession. Questioned on another point witness said he knew that when Mr. Leopold took out bills of lading he used to keep the Captain's copies somewhere about his desk, handing the Captain's copies to witness at the time the manifest was going to be prepared. They were then checked by witness and put in the general Captain's copies basket, and later on handed over to the Japanese to write out the manifests. That might apply to any bills of lading which were checked by Leopold himself.

This closed the witness's examination.

Mr. Terry, cross-examining—At one of his interviews at the hospital Mr. Leopold dictated to you a list of assets, did he not?—Yes.

Did Leopold at this time make any statement about these assets?—I think he did.

Did he mention the Phœnix Saw Mills as property in which he had some interest?—Yes.

Did he mention that it was in a Japanese name?—I don't remember.

Did he mention that it was outside of the foreign concession?—I daresay he did.

It was, as a matter of fact, outside the concession?—As far as I know.

Don't you know?—Yes.

Didn't he say he had put something like 50,000 yen into that property.—I cannot say.

Did he say that he, or he and others, were carrying on a saw mill business there?—My recollection doesn't go so far.

Do you know whether in fact he did carry on a saw mill business there?—Yes, I knew it, but I had no knowledge to what extent.

Do you know if he lost pretty heavily on it?—I do not know.

Do you know if he spoke of the Yoshihama-cho sited?—As it is down in the list of assets he may have done.

It is outside of the foreign concession?—Yes.

Did he mention the house and godown in Japanese town?—Yes.

What value did he put down for that?—3,000 yen.

Did he mention Kanazawa?—I cannot say.

He spoke of the paper factory in Tokyo?—I suppose so.

He was exporting wall paper?—I believe so, but I don't know anything of his private business.

In answer to other questions witness said in the draft list of assets there was an entry that might mean Yoshihama-cho and might mean Yoshida Shinden.

Mr. Terry—Did Leopold make any mention of being interested in a lighter company?—I find the word lighter company on the paper, but I don't remember anything about it. As there is "8,000" down it might refer to that Did he refer to a jinrikisha company and a coal company in Tokyo?—I cannot say.

Did he give any reason why he has not shipped these furs?—He gave no proper reason.

Did he give any reason at all?—No.

None at all?—Witness (after consideration)—Well he said he kept them both, I think.

Did he say anything about a rise of prices in furs?—I believe he send a telegram to that effect to London.

You don't recollect whether he said there had been a sudden rise in price in furs?—I do not.

Do you remember him saying that his business in furs had turned out very unfavourably and he lost a lot of money?—On the contrary.

Asked as to how he came to look in Leopold's drawer for the captain's copies, witness said he enquired of the Japanese in the shipping office, and found them on their information. The shipper had always the right to ship direct to the steamer, and not through the Pier Company, and witness believed treasure was always shipped in that way. It was not the practice in the office for the partners to sign bills of lading beforehand so as to have them ready for shippers when they came with their blue forms. It might happen occasionally. The steamer stayed in port from two to four days. He could not say how long it stayed on particular voyages mentioned. Witness thought it was an unusual thing for bills of lading to be given a long time before the sailing of steamers.

Mr. Terry—Here is one bill of January a little more than half way between the sailings of steamers—16 days after one and 14 days before the other. How is that?—If the goods were delivered to the Pier Company and a receipt obtained any bills of lading might be signed on the strength of such receipt.

Then your arrangement with the Pier Company enables you to give bills of lading at almost any time?—Yes, at almost any time; not at any time.

Do you know if this arrangement exists in the case of other companies, the P. & O. for example?—I don't know, they were Mr. Leopold's arrangements.

Do you recollect a case where certain goods were to be shipped by Leopold on the Hohenzollern, and matters went so far as the entering of particulars on the counterfoil, when it was found that the steamer was too full, and they had to be shipped by another steamer?—I remember a case when Mr. Leopold said the steamer was too full and they were shipped by another steamer, but I don't know that the steamer really was too full. It was Mr. Leopold's own decision.

Look at the counterfoil book. Is there a record there of applications from Mr. Leopold for shipment of skins marked otherwise than LI in a diamond?—Yes, folio 44, "Pc London 1 barrel skins." No number. Date 15th February 1898 E. Leopold as name of shipper.

Witness examined several other books of counterfoils without finding any other entries in the name of Leopold.

Were there not goods shipped by Leopold sometimes shipped in Japanese names?—Yes.

Then the fact that you do not find Leopold's name in the counterfoils does not imply that there were no shipments by him during that time?—No, we found that some goods were shipped by the Kaitsu Gomei Kaisha on account of Leopold.

Is there an entry about April 14th in the name of Leopold marked LI in a circle consisting of one case of furs?—No, it is in the name of K.G.K., the initials of the Kaitsu Gomei Kaisha.

Do you know that some goods of Mr. Leopold's were seized by the Chartered Bank after these troubles began?—Yes, I believe so.

Did any part of them consist of furs?—I believe there were some furs.

Were they not seized in Ahrens and Company's godowns?—Yes.

Were they not of the value of 6,000 or 7,000 yen?—I could not say.

Witness said he remembered one case when Leopold in his private shippings had obtained bills of lading by the N.D. Lloyd, sent the goods to which they referred by a steamer of another line, and had the bills of lading exchanged in London. Witness never assisted Leopold in his private business; he had refused to do so. Witness knew of cases in which Leopold had given bills of lading to shippers before they came to the office with their blue forms; this was in case of silk shipments. He did not know of Leopold remitting money to London to cover bills of lading in respect to which goods had not been shipped.

At this point the Court rose. It was agreed not to sit this afternoon, there being no probability of finishing the case for the prosecution, even with a late sitting.

SATURDAY, December 10th, 1898.

The hearing was resumed on Saturday morning.

On the Court assembling the witness Harmsen was recalled for further cross-examination by Mr. Terry.

Mr. Leopold was shipping large quantities of other articles besides furs, was he not?—Yes.

A pretty general export business?—Yes.

I refer you to the book of counterfoils beginning April 12th. Are there not one or two shipments of furs under this same mark L I in a diamond 9 8?—Yes, there are.

Those were numbers 1-5, 11-13, 41-45?—No, it is a little different. 14th April—1-4, (5 scratched out and altered to 4). 11-13 and 41-44 (45 altered to 44).

Was there not one consignment of furs marked L. I. in a circle numbered 24/76?—Yes.

How long was Leopold sick in hospital?—I should say from the beginning of April; I am not sure about the dates.

About how long did he stay there?—About the end of April, I believe.

He was there about a month?—About three weeks.

Do you know what was the matter with him?—Pneumonia.

He was ailing some time before?—Yes.

And absent off and on for some weeks before?—He might have been away a day or two. Yes.

He had been ailing for how long?—About four weeks.

When you saw him at the hospital the first time he was very sick?—Yes, I think more so than later on.

He had a severe illness?—He was very ill for one day, I believe.

Is it the practice generally to draw foreign bills of lading in sets?—Yes, I should think so.

His Honour—I think you may take that without evidence. From the memory of man they have been made in sets.

Did not Ahrens and Co. sometimes receive advices from Hongkong limiting the amount of cargo that could be shipped from here?—Not sometimes, but always. We get a wire about the tonnage to Europe.

You are advised then what amount of cargo can be taken by the European steamers and have to regulate your cargo accordingly?—Yes.

And you might have to refuse cargo?—Yes, it might be so.

It was occasionally so?—Yes, I think so occasionally.

The practice of giving one copy of bills of lading to the shipper is a practice in all companies?—I don't know. It is a rule of our company.

Is it not necessary that a copy should be delivered to the Captain?—It would do no harm if we did not, but it is always done.

The other copies went to the shipper and so were outside of the Company's control?—Yes.

Re-examined by Mr. Lowder—It might occur any voyage that cargo was shut out; he could not say whether it was the case in any particular voyages; no record was kept of such occurrences; it was mostly done verbally. He knew of a case where Leopold did not ship cargo that he intended to ship during the time between December and April. Witness could find it out by reference to the manifest book.

Witness was shown the manifest book and identified the entry as of the 2nd January, 1898, for wall paper and straw, braid. There were 39 packages of wall paper and 261 packages of straw braid. They were recorded in the manifest book by Leopold. Witness had spoken to Leopold about it, and he remembered that the latter said he would ship the goods on that manifest by the P. & O. steamer, and that he wanted the bills of lading he had already taken out for the N.D. Lloyd to be exchanged at destination. That was the only occasion he recollected when cargo the accused intended to ship was not shipped. Asked if, as far as he knew, any application was made for spaces for freight in the case of the bills of lading in exhibits A to H (covering transactions which are the subject of the charges), witness said he could not say anything about it, and he could not say either whether the goods existed or not. If they had been shipped they ought to appear in the manifests now in Court.

Mr. Lowder said he proposed at this point to ask the witness to refresh his memory by reference to the book of manifests, but he would ask one or two questions first in order not to take counsel for the other side by surprise if he proposed to object.

Were these manifests made by you?—I believe not one.

Were they read over by you shortly after they were written out by some other person?—They were.

When you had read them over did you know them to be correct in this sense that they were correctly copied from the documents from which they were prepared?—Yes.

Mr. Lowder—Now I propose to ask the witness to refresh his memory by reference to these manifests.

The Judge put some questions to the witness, and elicited the fact that in some cases the Japanese clerks compared the manifests with the receipt forms, and referred to him in case anything called for query. Sometimes he himself checked them with the Japanese clerks, but the other method was often followed.

His Honour pointed out to Mr. Lowder that the witness, very properly anxious not to fall into any error, had pointed out that the comparisons were not always made by him, but that the checking was actually done by Japanese.

His Honour did not think the manifests could be put in on that ground.

Mr. Lowder—I will then put to the witness another question. Has any complaint been made by the shipper of the non-delivery at destination of goods with regard to the bills of lading in exhibits A to H?—Not that I am aware of.

Mr. Martin (a juror)—Were you on good terms with Mr. Leopold up to the time of the interview at the hospital?—Yes.

Mr. Martin called attention to the fact that witness had said he did not know that the bills of lading in exhibits A. to H. existed. Did he not make out insurance policies for those goods?

Witness admitted this, but said he was not aware because of that of the existence or shipment of the goods.

In answer to Mr. Walker, witness said Leopold carried on his private business mostly at No. 59, but he did not know where he stored his goods.

Mr. Martin asked as to the words of the telegram received from the N. D. Lloyd.

The Judge pointed out that this would not be proper evidence, but Mr. Terry afterwards said he would put in the telegram.

His Honour—You can do so, but not the other side.

The telegram was given to the witness, who read it as follows:—

> Lampson London claim 133 packages furs shipped by Leopold Yokohama December January which we cannot trace whereabouts. Cleats.

The last word, the witness explained, meant "Immediate answer required." He believed the 12 packages shipped in April were part of two lots for which bills of lading were taken out in December or January.

Asked as to when the goods shipped in December and January ought to have arrived in London, witness said about 52 days after the departure of the steamer from Yokohama.

It was pointed out that there was a large discrepancy between the 133 packages mentioned in the N. D. Lloyd telegram and the number in the documents before the Court referring to December and January.

Mr. Terry said that might be explained. There were 45 packages which went before the shipment of December 31st which were not shipped till April. Also Leopold was shipping under other numbers than those in the documents before the Court, and he suggested that the balance of the goods might be accounted for thus.

Witness said Leopold made an explanation. Shown a paper, he said it was written by Mr. Wismer, and witness was present when he wrote it. Part of the entries were taken out of Leopold's private pocket book. Leopold admitted the non-shipment of the 133 packages, and they went through the Captain's copies. There were not enough captain's copies to make up the total, and they took Leopold's private book which he gave them, and were able to make the list up by the entries in that. The number traced by the Captain's copies was 108.

Mr. Terry thought it would be better to leave the point till Mr. Wismer's evidence, as he could speak as to the list he had taken.

This was agreed to, Mr. Lowder remarking that the counsel for the prosecution were placed in a rather awkward position. They could throw light on the matter, but were debarred from doing so.

His Honour—I quite see the position you are in.

Mr. Martin asked what shipments of furs could have reached London by April 22nd.

Witness replied that those for December, January, and February could have reached their destination by that date. The alleged shipments for those months covered 90 packages.

After a protracted conversation, Mr. Terry suggested that the list made by Mr. Wismer should after all be put in. It read as follows:—Dec. 2nd 1-20, 20 packages; Dec. 29th 21-40, 20 packages; Dec. 30th, 41-45 5 packages; Dec. 31st 46-55, 10 packages; Dec. 31st 56-95, 40 packages, Jan. 10th, 96-105, 10 packages; Jan. 14th 106-113, 8 packages; Jan. 14th, 114-119, 6 packages; Jan. 17th 120-133; 14 packages; total 133.

The Judge pointed out to the Jury that of this list there were only included in the indictment Nos. 45 to 106, and the others were not included in the indictment at all.

The Court then rose.

MONDAY, 12th December.

The hearing was resumed on Monday morning.

On the Court reassembling, the witness Harmssen was recalled.

A Juror (Mr. Walker)—Was the telegram you received from the N.D. Lloyd in English or in German?—In English.

Who received the telegram?—The firm.

But which member of the firm opened it?—Either Mr. Wismer or myself. I cannot remember which.

Had you the original telegram when you visited Mr. Leopold at the hospital?—Yes.

Did you have any reason for not showing it to him?—No, I believe I did show it to him.

To your knowledge did Mr. Hoffman see the telegram?—At the time Mr. Hoffman was in Kobe, but he certainly saw the telegram later.

You said in your evidence—"At the time Mr. Leopold was in the hospital I asked him if they (the furs) were shipped, and he said they were not. I remarked that I should have to speak to Mr. Wismer, and we should have to make further enquiries, as we could not trace them." What did you mean by that?—Mr. Leopold had mentioned that he had kept back the goods, and that made us believe that they were in existence.

Then you meant to trace them in Yokohama?—I meant to trace them anywhere.

What manifest did the agents in London receive, the copy made by you in the office, or a copy made on board the ship? I believe copies are made on board the ship. I cannot say what the practice is. Three copies are delivered to the ship.

Supposing bills of lading to arrive for goods which are not forthcoming would it not be the duty of someone in the shipping office to refer to the manager?

Witness—You mean the agent at home.

Mr. Walker—Yes.

Witness—Yes, I suppose it would.

The cargo that left Yokohama on the 25th December should have reached London about the 17th February?—Yes, about that day; I said in about 50 days.

And that shipped on the 22nd January about the 13th March?—Yes, I should think so.

And that by the following steamer on the 14th April?—Yes.

By the Judge—The exhibit produced was, he believed, in Mr. Hoffman's writing. Witness was not present when it was written.

Henry William Fraser asked to correct an inaccuracy in his figures owing to a defective press copy. He took the figure 18,500 in one of the letters from the bank to the accused to be 15,500. He had been able to detect this by reference to an other document in the Bank.

Toguchi Shosaburo, who was examined in English, said he was in the employ of the Pier Traffic and Lighter Company, which carried on business as a landing and shipping agency. They had an agreement with Ahrens & Co. for shipping cargo. They got blue shipping forms from Ahrens and Company, and on receiving cargo at the Customs Compound at the Hatoba they entered its marks and all particulars concerning it. They then made out white forms, one of which was delivered with the cargo to the Hohenzollern. Witness did not know Leopold. He only knew the cargoes of Ahrens and Co. On the 24th December he received, according to the counterfoils produced, cargo, marked LI in a circle, 2211 23; 2269-77. It consisted of [illegible] cases of wall paper. Under the same mark were eight bales of paper, five cases of shells, 45 cases of shells—total 80. There were no other entries in December or January marked either LI in a diamond or LI in a circle. Under date 4th March, 1898, were 28 packages of wall paper, feathers, and chilis under the same mark. This was by the steamer Crefeld. By the same ship, under LI in a diamond, on the 5th March, were entries of four cases of skins. By the Hohenzollern dated 14th April, were entries under LI in a diamond of five bales of furs four three bales of furs, and four cases of furs. On the same date under LI in a circle was one case of furs. He could not find any other entries under either mark. He had searched through the books from 24th Dec., 1897, to 14th April, 1898. He had searched through the blue forms from Ahrens and Co.'s office from the 1st December, 1897, to the end of April. There were shipments on December 23rd by the Kaitsu Gomei Kaisha, marked L I in a circle, 22 cases of wall paper, 8 bales of furs, five bales of furs, three bales of furs, and four cases of furs, and one case under L I in a circle. These were all by the Hohenzollern. He could find no other entries referring to shipments by that steamer. In regard to the Crefeld on 28th February, 1898, there was an entry marked L I in a circle, in the name of the Kaitsu Gomei Kaisha, of 10 cases of wall paper, 8 bales of feathers, one case of feathers, 5 cases of shells, 45 cases of shells.

His Honour—(To the Jury): That agrees exactly with the white form.

Witness, continuing, said on 14th April, 1898, under L I in a circle, the Kaitsu Gomei Kaisha shipped 20 cases of duties. On the same day the same company shipped, under L I in a diamond some packages of leathers, and 9 packages of chilis.

It appeared that there was a discrepancy between the blue forms and the white forms with regard to the 20 cases of chilis, mentioned in the first, and it was explained that the witness must have turned over two pages of the counterfoil book instead of one when looking through it. He now read the entry, which corresponded with that of the blue forms. There were no other entries relating to goods marked L I in a diamond.

By Mr. Terry—Witness was the manager of the shipping and landing business of the Company.

Witness could not say whether accused shipped goods also under the mark E. C. L; he did not know what marks he used. He could not find in the blue forms an entry of December 28th, in the name of the Kaitsu Gomei Kaisha, marked L I in a diamond, 14 packages of wall paper.

By Mr. Walker—The Pier Company only got mate's receipts for cargo that was shipped by them, but so far as he knew all Ahrens and Co's cargo went through them.

Mr. Terry—Who pay your charges—the shipper or Ahrens and Co?—Ahrens and Co. for export cargo.

The Court then adjourned for tiffin.

On the Court reassembling, Karl Friedrich Adalbert Ehlert, a German subject, said he was second mate on board the Hohenzollern in December last year. When the Hohenzollern was in port it was witness's duty to attend to the receipt of cargo. She was in the harbour at Yokohama in December last. He could not himself remember whether accused shipped any cargo that month, but he could tell by reference to his cargo books. Witness produced the books for the 31st and 32nd voyages. There was no entry for the 31st voyage (to Hongkong) marked L I in a diamond. There were some cases of wall paper, feathers, shells, &c., of that date. The details were as mentioned in the last witness's evidence. He received no cargo marked L I in a diamond from Yokohama on the voyages of January, February, or March, but in April there was an entry with those marks for twelve bales of furs. There was also one case of furs marked L I in a circle, and 20 bags of chilis under the same mark.

His Honour—That agrees pretty well with the statement by the manager of the Pier Company.

Witness believed that three manifests were delivered on board the ship. At Hongkong two were sent on board the other steamer, and the other they kept on board.

Cross-examined—The time the Hohenzollern stayed in harbour varied, two, three four, or five days. Witness did not know if Mr. Leopold shipped cargo under other marks than L I.

By the Judge—He could say that there was no other cargo on board during the voyages mentioned beyond that which he had specified.

Emil Wismer, a German subject, and senior partner in the firm of H. Ahrens & Co., was next examined by Mr. Lowder. The prosecution had, he said, been instituted at his request. He had searched for and found the telegram of April 22nd from the N.D. Lloyd. The telegram (produced) read as follows:—

Bremen Lampsons London 133 claim packages furs shipped by Leopold, Yokohama, December January which we cannot trace. Wire whereabouts at once. Cleats.

The last-mentioned word meant "immediate answer required." Witness was resident in Yokohama in December last. The accused was in witness's employment, and he continued so till the 8th or 9th May this year. He had been in the employ of the firm since 1878, as far as witness could remember, and had been with them even before. In 1878 the name of the firm was H. Ahrens & Co. The present firm was Ahrens and Co. Nachfolger. The old firm had different branches, while the new firm had only an import business. The firm took the new names on January 1st, 1887. Witness came to the firm in October, 1878. Accused was already in the firm of H. Ahrens and Co., in London, and was at that time an office boy specially attending to shipping business in London. Witness was a general clerk for a short time in London. Witness came to Japan in 1879. Accused came to Japan in 1882 or 1883, and was placed in the shipping and assurance department. He had no one above him in that department. The firm had every confidence in his ability, capacity, and honesty. He had been in charge of the department ever since that time until May this year. Besides his salary he had a share in the profits of the shipping and insurance. Witness would certainly say that accused knew much more than he himself did about the shipping and insurance department. During the period named witness had been in the habit of signing shipping documents brought before him. It was quite impossible for witness to examine every document brought before him for signature. Witness identified his signature on the bills of lading and polices of insurance produced. Up to the time he received the telegram from the Norddeutscher Lloyd he had no suspicion that the goods to which these documents purported to refer had not been shipped. In reply to the telegram a message was sent by witness's firm. He sent up the witness Harmssen to Mr. Leopold to ask him if he could explain the matter, and it was on Harmssen's report that the reply telegram was sent. The document produced was a copy of the reply telegram written by Harmssen.

His Honour thought they were drifting into hearsay evidence, and suggested that Harmssen should be recalled for a moment.

Harmssen was accordingly brought into the box once more, but could not say of his own knowledge whether the copy produced was actually sent exactly as it appeared there. He gave, however, the general sense of the message, which has been published several times.

Mr. Lowder said that was as far as he could take it. He could not put the document in.

The examination of the witness Wismer was then resumed. He said some of the letters in accused's handwriting were written on old memorandum forms of the firm with the name of the old firm, Ahrens and Co., and not of the new firm Ahrens and Co. Nachfolger, printed on them. Witness had never given accused permission to use the firm's note paper, either old or new, for his private business; he simply had no knowledge of the matter. Witness saw accused about 10 days or a fortnight after the receipt of the telegram. He was then in the German Hospital. Witness did not think he was very ill then; he was on the way to recovery. Witness wanted to speak to him about the general trouble and also about the list of assets. He received a letter in accused's handwriting as follows:—

ENCLOSURE.

DEAR MR. LEOPOLD,—The following telegram has just arrived from Lampson: "Ship goods or send remittance at once to over the total amount. C. M. L. & Co." Yours, etc.,

A. J. DOUGLAS LLOYD.

DEAR MR. WISMER,—Above wire arrived just after you left. From my knowledge of the people I believe them to be satisfied. They only want to push me. I shall wire as follows to-morrow noon, by which time you may have heard something from London: "Deliveries will be completed within (?) ten days. Therefore kindly allow me this time."

P.S.—I know the people and am perfectly certain that the matter is in order.

(Signed) E. LEOPOLD.

That must have reached him between the third and sixth of May; it was not dated. The letter (produced) reached him the last few days of April.

Mr. Terry—I think I must object, as the letter refers to other matters, and may tend to introduce more confusion into an already too complicated case.

His Honour—(After examining the document): No, that must go in. It is a continuation of the evidence.

The letter was read as follows:—

DEAR MR. WISMER,—I thank you for wiring the £5,000, which will, I am sure, satisfy Lampson's for the present. I have several drafts due on the 2nd May, with my brother in London, I think about £3,500, of which he has sold £2,000, leaving a balance of £1,500 which should be paid on Monday. I shall esteem it a great favour if you will instruct London to pay him £1,500. Goods or warrants to be handed to London office. This will present my credit being entirely spoiled at the Chartered Bank. It is bad enough now. I assure that I shall do everything to get out of the mess as quickly as possible.

Yours truly, (Signed) E. LEOPOLD.

Leopold had spoken about the matter to Mr. Hoffman, and asked him to wire this sum of £5,000 to cover shipments not gone forward, and to meet drafts which he said were due in London on the 2nd or 3rd May. He promised Mr. Hoffman to pay back the amount in about a week.

His Honour pointed out that this witness could not be asked about a communication made to Mr. Hoffman. Counsel had had Mr. Hoffman in the box already.

Witness, continuing, said he found that the £5,000 was wired on the 2nd May.

Mr. Lowder: How was it that Ahrens and Co. consented to pay money that was payable by the accused?

Witness—We remitted this £5,000 because we were finally the responsible parties owing to our signature of the bills of lading. Besides he promised us to pay back this amount in about a week.

His Honour—To you?—No, to Mr. Hoffman.

Mr. Lowder—During the conversation between yourself and the accused did you inform him that your firm would assume the responsibility for all the goods that had not been shipped?—I did not tell him so, I think, but I assumed that the firm would have to do it.

Have you informed the accused whether or not you have paid the whole amount?—No.

Mr. Lowder said he now intended to ask whether the firm had paid the whole of the bills drawn by the accused on Lampson & Co. Counsel for the defence had asked if the bank had lost anything over these bills, and had been answered in the negative. He submitted that was a foundation for the question.

His Honour asked the witness how he got a list of bills, and witness stated that they got Leopold's book and looked up the amounts of the drafts.

At this point the Court adjourned.

TUESDAY, 13th December, 1898.

The hearing was resumed on Tuesday morning.

Mr. Lowder—With reference to the exhibit last before the Court we have, your Honour, very clear and distinct evidence from Mr. Hoffman taken towards the end of the second day's proceedings.

His Honour read the entries.

Mr. Lowder—I think we have established that the exhibit is in the handwriting of the accused.

His Honour said he understood Mr. Terry did not object on that point.

Mr. Terry—That is so.

His Honour—The question is not whether the list was written by the accused, but the question is as to the admissibility of Mr. Wismer's evidence as to what he said.

The witness, Wismer, recalled, said the list of drafts in the exhibit corresponded with the list in the bills of exchange, with the exception that a sum of £2,000 was put down instead of the two sums of £875 and £1,125.

His Honour—Now, I think, you are entitled to ask what you intended to ask—whether the witness has paid or has caused to be paid the whole of those drafts.

Mr. Lowder put the question to the witness.

Mr. Terry made an objection.

Mr. Lowder—Before that objection is heard it may facilitate matters to ask another question. Did the accused ask you personally to meet those drafts?

Witness—He told me he had not shipped the goods and did not intend to ship the goods, and that we had to meet the drafts.

His Honour—Can you object after that, Mr. Terry?

Mr. Terry—I will not argue the objection. I make a formal objection. I am not quite certain if the objection is well founded, and I will not take up the time of the Court in arguing it. I will simply make a formal objection.

Have you made arrangements to meet all those drafts?—Yes, we have arranged.

Mr. Lowder—I propose to put in this exhibit, Mr. Terry. (To witness): Is this a letter in the handwriting of the accused addressed to Mr. Hoffman?—Yes, from these words, "Dear Mr. Hoffman," it is in his handwriting and signed by him.

Do you recollect receiving it, and at what time?—In the first days of May.

Mr. Lowder read the letter as follows:—

Translation of telegram—"Will the Bank make renewal Monday due? Bank refuse to make loan if not guaranteed. Moseley declines without definite instructions. Remit all you can £1,500.

Dear Mr. WISMER and HOFFMANN,—Above is wire received from my brother. The Bank will apparently make the loan if guaranteed by you. The best way out of the trouble is to remit, which I trust you will be able to do.

Yours, E. LEOPOLD.

Mr. Lowder—In consequence of the requests preferred to you by accused did you despatch this telegram (produced) to London?—Yes, it was despatched at the request of the accused.

Mr. Lowder read a press copy of the translation of the telegram, Mr. Terry making no objection:—

May 2, 1898 (Translation). We have opened credit in your favour with Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation £1500. Pay Leopold against warrants. We have opened credit in your favour with Chartered Bank £5000. Lampson.

Mr. Lowder—To whom was that sent?—From Ahrens, Yokohama, to Ahrens, London.

Those are the £1500 and £5000 alluded to in the correspondence which has been put in?—Yes.

Who is the Leopold referred to in the telegram?—Accused's brother in London.

Witness said they received a reply to this telegram from London, and they replied to that. The telegram produced was the reply despatched to London. The telegram read:—

May 4. £1,000 do not pay. Await further instructions.

The paper produced was in the handwriting of the accused. It was received by witness in the first few days of May.

Mr. Lowder read the letter:—

Dear Mr. WISMER,—My brother just wires me that he can manage with £800, therefore please to wire this amount to London, so that I can square off the bills. I thought the matter was in order and told the Bank so. By wiring above I can settle with them here easier.

Yours, E. LEOPOLD.

This was subsequent to the despatch of the last-mentioned wire.

Witness did not wire the £800 as requested. The paper produced was written and signed by the accused, and received by witness about the 8th or 9th May.

Dear Mr. WISMER,—Kindly keep back the advertisement until to-morrow if possible as I wish to inform some of my friends personally. I trust that you will word the advertisement in such a way that I shall not be entirely ruined before the Yokohama community, especially as I am now trying to raise mortgages on the saw mills and other property.

YOURS, E. LEOPOLD.

What was the advertisement referred to in that letter?—It was as to his dismissal from the firm.

The letter produced was in the accused's handwriting. It was addressed to witness. The document enclosed was signed by accused.

Mr. Lowder read the letter as follows:—

Dear Mr. WISMER,—I beg to hand you the list required. The original list which I handed to Mr. Hoffmann was a complete one of my assets and I told him at the time that I owed the Chartered Bank yen 54,000 (or 64,000—the first figure being very indistinct). I have therefore made out a new list for the Chartered and have used for them the goods or properties which take longest to realise. You need not tell them that. I have used the Nakamura and Sugamo-cho properties, which are very difficult to sell with the lease to you. I could get any price for the lot provided they were empty. The lighters in course of construction will be two months before we can deliver, also other work. I will get you the title deeds as quickly as possible. I hope to sell the saw mills outright. They will bring at least yen 100,000 as a going concern. The land is also well in hand.

E. LEOPOLD.

Attached to this letter was a list of accused's assets, which he stated that he assigned to Ahrens & Co. The list was as follows:—

	YEN.
Phœnix Saw Mills	80,000
Yoshihama-cho shed and lease, let at 40 yen a month	1,000
House and Godown in Japanese Town	2,500
Land in Kanazawa	1,100
Paper manufactory in Tokyo	4,000
(These are all in Mr. Uyeda's name)
Yoshida Shinden, land, outlay on loans	37,000
(In Messrs. Uyeda's and Gisa's name)
Claim London Assurance Company	30,000
Various unsold stocks in London	30,000
Sundry amounts owing to me	3,000
Shares	12,000
Skins, coal, wood, and other goods unsold	36,000
No. 59 furniture, dwelling house and offices	3,500
Total	240,100

Besides this he (the accused) assigned all profits made on the above businesses, estimated to amount to between yen 60,000 and yen 70,000.

Mr. Lowder (to Mr. Terry)—Here are some other letters from the prosecution. We do not propose to put them in, unless you would like them put in. They have not been alluded to, but they somewhat bear upon the evidence that has been given.

Mr. Terry, after examining the letters, handed them back without comment.

Mr. Lowder—I show witness a document with certain other documents attached, and ask him by whom they are signed.

Witness: This letter is signed by the accused. The documents are also signed by the accused. The letter is addressed to Lampsons and was sent back from London. It was received in Yokohama about two or three days ago, may be four or five by the American Mail, the last steamer from San Francisco.

Mr. Lowder—I propose to put the letter in.

His Honour—You can't resist that, I suppose, Mr. Terry?

Mr. Terry—I don't object.

Mr. Lowder then read the letter:—

Yokohama, 6th May, 1898.

Messrs. C. M. LAMPSON & Co., London.

DEAR SIRS,—I am in receipt of your letter of 1st April, and enclose copies of telegrams which have passed between us.

Resale of Goods.—I wired you on the 25th ult., asking whether prices would be greatly affected by the war rumours and also mentioning that I had held the goods back on this account. In the meantime I must confirm my telegram of the 29th in which I mentioned that I could resell my whole stock at the following prices:—

Tanuki 3/8
Marten 5/9
Sable 9/6

These goods will go to the Chinese market exclusively, and so will not clash with your interests at all. The prices mentioned include your commission of 5 per cent. and I thank you for your permission to do so. I have been for the last month laid up with pneumonia in the German Hospital, and my health is such that I am forced to retire from business, and go home to Europe. Therefore my lengthy telegram, which I hope was explicit. Previous to the pneumonia I was suffering from chest and lung troubles, and fearing that holding large stocks of unsold furs in London would cause too much anxiety I decided upon this step, and, receiving this offer, I thought I had better clear out my stock. You will have seen from my telegram that I have remitted £5000 through Ahrens, and I mentioned in the same wire that further remittances would be sent directly deliveries took place. Your other wire asking me to remit in full was duly received, but I think that you will readily understand that deliveries in such a large stock as mine necessarily take time. I therefore telegraphed asking for a fortnight's grace, by which time the deliveries will be, I expect, completed. Since this sale has taken place, prices for the goods mentioned have declined considerably and large stocks of Tanuki are practically unsaleable, the natives preferring to pluck the skins for pens in preference to selling them to foreigners. I trust that you have informed the Norddeutscher Lloyd of the reason for the delay in shipping.

I am closing up my business here as mentioned above on account of ill-health, and feel exceedingly pleased that this sale was consummated, as it takes a load of responsibility off my mind, which in my weak state I was scarcely able to bear. I hope to close this transaction in the time mentioned in my last telegram and trust that everything will be in order.

I remain, dear sir, yours faithfully,

E. LEOPOLD.

April 25th, 1898

[Copy of Telegrams.]

Leopold to Lampson and Co. War will it a effect prices? How much do you expect? Last prices fully maintained locally. Shipments delayed. Suspend claims Lloyd. Wait my letter.

Lampson to Leopold, April 29th.—War is not likely to affect prices, stock is exhausted. We must insist upon immediate shipment.

Leopold to Lampson, April 29th.—Can resell whole stock locally for Chinese market at following prices. Tanuki 38; Marten 5-9, sable 9/6 less 6 per cent. commission to you. Request permission to do so on account ill-health which forces me to retire from business.—Leopold.

Lampson to Leopold, May 3.—Ship goods or send remittances at once to cover the total amount.—C.M.L. and Co.

Leopold to Lampson, May 2;—Thanks, have have arranged resale. Have remitted £5,000 T.T. through Ahrens; further remittances follow as soon deliveries are made.—Leopold.

Mr. Lowder—We have asked for the production of the reply to that letter.

Mr. Terry—I don't think we have it here.

Cross-examined by Mr. Terry—Witness had only one interview with Leopold at the hospital. That was after Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Harmssen had come back and reported their interview. Witness went to the hospital in consequence of what they said, especially with regard to the list of assets. His conversation with Leopold was partly on the basis of what had been reported to him. Witness had seen the list of 133 missing packages of furs before he went to the hospital. The list of drafts was handed witness by Hoffmann. Witness did not show it to Leopold. Afterwards witness had various talks with Leopold about his drafts that remained uncovered and Leopold asked him to meet them. Leopold's explanations as to why he had not shipped goods always differed; he might have given many explanations about them. Witness could not remember any one explanation.

Have you any recollection of his giving as explanation losses he had incurred in outside enterprises?—I don't remember whether he did or not.

I suppose you thought this matter of non-shipment had been discussed sufficiently by Mr. Hoffmann and Mr. Harmssen?—Yes. I chiefly spoke about the list of assets.

Was either of these lists of assets handed to you directly by accused?—No.

You asked him, I suppose, particularly about items of those assets?—Yes.

Did he explain to you that all those landed properties were held in Japanese hands?—Yes.

He spoke to you of the saw mills, of course. Did he tell you whether his business had been profitable or not?—I don't recollect.

Did he tell you the amount of money he had put into the saw mill?—No. I think he told me they were his own property.

As to any of those items mentioned there did he in any case say what he had paid for them?—No.

Or how much he had invested in any form in those businesses?—No.

You simply asked him what they were worth? You did not take the trouble to enquire?—I took his word. I asked him when he could realise them.

He promised to realise them as soon as he could?—So he said.

Do you remember the Yoshida Shinden land? In that case he explained to you that he had put in 37,000 yen?—No, he did not explain personally. He has put it in his list of assets, but I had not that at that time.

Did he explain to you that this land was mortgaged to a Japanese for 6,000 yen?—No, I found that out from a Japanese lawyer.

And hasn't he explained to you that that prevented him from realising?—No, he has not.

He has assigned part of these assets to you, has he not?—Yes, but that has been placed to another debt. That has nothing to do with this.

He offered to transfer the Yoshida Shinden land to you, did he not, but you declined as you did not want to take up the mortgage?—I don't recollect.

Do you remember any talk with Mr. Leopold, probably late last year or early this year—do you recollect asking him, "Why are you getting bills of lading in that way. I suppose it is for convenience at the bank?"—I could not say for certain.

Then you think there might have been some talk of that?—No, I can't remember.

Don't you recollect even speaking to him in any way about these bills, or that he was getting advances from the bank?—No, I know nothing about his advances.

Did you not know generally that he was selling documentary drafts to the bank?—No, I didn't know it.

Did Leopold ever explain to you what became of the money for goods not sent forward?—No, I don't know.

When you were talking with him, you or Mr. Hoffman or Mr. Harmssen spoke of those drafts, and of course you understood that he had got that money from the bank?—Yes.

Did you ever ask him what he had done with that money?—I don't know what he has done with it.

But did you ask him?—I may have asked him

Don't you recollect as a matter of fact you did ask him?—I don't recollect, but I may have asked him to make as quick as possible to get us back the money.

But that isn't the question. Didn't you ask him what he had done with this money?—I don't recollect.

Is it possible?—It may be. I don't recollect.

You asked him to raise money for you as soon as he could?—Yes.

And you discussed the means?—I may have done so.

Didn't it occur to you that he might pay you back some of this money he got from the bank?—I hoped so.

But didn't you ask him?—I may have.

But didn't you?—I can't recollect.

Do you happen to know whether the Chartered Bank seized some of Mr. Leopold's furs?—Yes.

Do you know the value?—No.

Not even the approximate value?—No.

When was this?—It might be the end of May or the beginning of June. It may have been earlier than that.

It might have been 6,000 or 7,000 dollars worth?—I don't know.

Did Mr. Leopold assign as a reason for not shipping furs any sudden rise in the price of furs here?—I don't know anything about the prices of furs.

By Mr. Martin (a Juror)—The word "Lampson" in the telegram signified that Ahrens & Co. in London should pay £5,000 to Messrs. Lampson & Co.

James Maclean, accountant of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank at Yokohama, said he was acquainted with the accused. He had an account with the Bank, and from time to time drew cheques against that account. Witness produced cheques from 31st December last year to 28th April this year. The cheque dated 9th February was in favour of the Russo Chinese Bank for 28,000 yen. It was endorsed by Browne and Co., agents for the Russo-Chinese Bank. Witness brought with him examined copies of extracts from the Bank ledgers containing particulars of the account with accused from June, 1897, to June, 1898. He had examined the entries personally; they were exact copies of the entries in the Bank books. On February 14th there was an entry of 28,091 yen to the credit of Ahrens and Co. That was a mistake; it should have been Leopold. Witness found out the mistake and adjusted it. Through this mistake there was an apparent overdraft, but no real overdraft during that month. On the 31st December, 1897, during a portion of the day the account was at debit by 40,750 yen, but during the day Leopold paid in in sterling the equivalent of 42,816 yen, showing at the close of day a balance of 1 540 yen. On the 22nd February there was an overdraft caused by Leopold's credit from Lampson having been exhausted. Leopold sent in a bill for £2,000 on Lampson, but the credit would only admit of £1,125, and for the balance Leopold had to wire to Lampson to get an extension of the credit. The advice arrived in the course of the next day. From the 1st to 4th March there was a small overdraft, but it was cleared off, and after that there was no overdraft for more than a part of the day, except the final one of yen 151·97, which still existed. Leopold then drew a cheque for 1500 yen when he had only 1300 yen odd to his credit, producing an overdraft of 151·97 yen, this, however, being reduced by the allowance of interest to 146 47 yen. Witness was shown the bills of exchange sold by accused to the Bank, and said that Leopold could have received cash for any of them if he had asked for cash. If his account had been overdrawn at any time the Bank would still have purchased his bills. Witness had practically the same authority as to buying bills as the manager had. He should not have credited the accused with the amounts of the bills except as against documents.

By Mr. Terry—Mr. Leopold's account was overdrawn all through 1897, often for substantial amounts. Witness only arrived the first of this year, and so knew no details. The cheque to the Russo-Chinese Bank was paid through the Chartered Bank. With regard to the particular draft of 31st December the Bank would have insisted, if he had asked to be paid in cash, on the money going to Leopold's account to clear off his overdraft. Witness had full authority to allow overdrafts. Witness saw the bills first, and then passed them on to Fraser. The manager made the decision as to whether the bills should be bought. When the Bank had bought the bills they were sent to London, and were then presented for acceptance. As soon as Mr. Lampson paid the bills he got the documents. This was a pretty general method of doing business—all over the Far East. If the documents appeared in order it was not necessary to enquire further. He believed there were one or two small amounts to Leopold's credit during the present year, apart from these particular transactions. In January there were amounts of 2,500 yen and 1,100 yen on February 24th 8,000 yen, the proceeds of a bill, and in March a total of about 10,000 yen.

By the Judge—The manager made the contracts, but the Bank would afterwards buy certain bills of certain denomination without reference to the manager. Instructions were given to Mr. Fraser, and if the bills were in order they were passed and put to Leopold's credit without the manager having seen them. Witness examined them before they left the office.

William Kirtland Wilson, a partner in Browne and Company, said in February last that company were acting as agents of the Russo-Chinese Bank in Yokohama. Witness was handed the cheque dated February 9th and identified his signature on the back of it. The accounts of the Russo-Chinese Bank were kept by a current account with the Chartered Bank. A letter was here handed witness, but he said he did not know the signature of the accused.

Harrison was recalled to prove the signature.

The letter was then read:—

Feb. 9th, 1898.

Messrs. Browne & Co.
Agents Russo-Chinese Bank.

Dear Sirs,—I shall feel obliged by your transmitting the following telegram on my account either literally or in cipher to your manager at London, it being distinctly understood that the same be sent entirely at my risk, and that your bank is not to be held liable either for any mistake or omission which may happen in the transmission of the message, or from its misinterpretation when received. The cost of the message I will defray upon application.

Yours Faithfully, E. Leopold.

Pay C. E. Leopold and Co., 24 Cecil Street, Charing Cross Road, London.

£5,500 (five thousand five hundred pounds sterling) only.

The amount was wired to the Russo-Chinese Bank at Shanghai, and thence to London. The Bank were recouped by Leopold's cheques.

Mr. Terry—Do you know for what purpose Mr. Leopold was sending this money to London?

Witness—I have no idea.

Mr. Terry—That is all.

Edwin Manifold Janion, accountant of the Chartered Bank, said he had been in Yokohama since February 24th this year. He knew Leopold. He was one of the constituents of the Bank. In February, 1898, the Chartered Bank kept the account of the Russo-Chinese Bank. The cheque produced was for 28,000 yen dated 9th February drawn by Leopold in favour of the Russo-Chinese Bank, and endorsed by Browne and Co. The account produced was taken one of the Bank's books. On February 9th there were two entries to the debit of accused, 430 yen, and 26,432 yen. The signature on the cheque produced (that of February 9th) was Leopold's. The slip produced was a slip from the Russo-Chinese Bank dated February 9th, paying into the Chartered Bank 54,432 yen to the credit of their account. It was made up of a cheque on the Chartered Bank for 26,432 yen and another for 28,000 yen on the Hongkong Bank—both drawn by accused. The cheque on themselves was debited to Leopold's account and the cheque on the Hongkong Bank paid into that Bank the same day. The document produced was a paying in slip dated February 1st for 17,000 yen to the credit of Leopold's account. This partly referred to a cheque on the Hongkong Bank, for 11,000 yen, drawn by Leopold, and the rest to cheques on Japanese Banks. On February 19th there was a record of a telegraphic transfer for 55,565 yen to London in favour of C. E. Leopold. This was signed by Leopold. The transfer was made through the Chartered Bank at the request of the accused.

By Mr. Terry—During all the time to which the account referred the account was over-drawn and the sum paid in merely went to reduce the overdraft.

Herbert Maurice Bevis, Manager in Yokohama of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, was examined by Mr. Lowder. He stated that the bills of exchange produced were bills he had given instructions should be purchased on the security of bills of lading and other documents. The whole of the bills were purchased.

By Mr. Terry: The firm of Lampson and Co. were a firm of excellent reputation and high credit. The bills were all at four months.

If Mr. Lampson's credit had been simply "You may buy Leopold's bill and I will accept them" your security would have been as good as if you had the documents?—I should prefer the documents.

You were quite willing to lend money on the joint security of Leopold and Lampson?—No, I don't say that. I had the documents, and they represented what seemed to be a bona fide transaction. If they had not been accompanied by documents they would not have been in accordance with the original terms, and they would not have been accepted.

Mr. Marten (a Juror) pointed out to the witness that on the bill of lading it was stated that the goods would be forwarded by that or a subsequent steamer. The witness could not say whether cargo for which bills had been accepted by the Bank had been shut out on any particular voyage; he presumed such cases might occur. He should suppose he would have some notice in such cases, but so far as he could remember he had never had any. He should not take it that the words in the bill of lading meant that the shipping might be postponed for an indefinite time.

By the Judge—He regarded a bill with documents with greater confidence than a bill without documents.

By Mr. Terry—The existence of documents would show him that the bill was a business bill bill and not an accommodation bill.

Mr. Litchfield: That closes the case for the prosecution, my lord. (To Mr. Terry). Do you intend to call any witnesses, Mr. Terry?

Mr. Terry: I do not.

The Court adjourned till ten o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, December 14th.

The hearing was resumed on Wednesday morning.

On the Court assembling the Judge asked Mr. Lowder if he understood aright that only a portion of the cheques on the Chartered Bank and the account were put in, but that the whole of Hongkong and Shanghai Bank cheques were put in.

Mr. Lowder—That is so, my lord.

Mr. Terry said he had no objection to them being put in, but there was a question he should have asked if he had known that they were actually put in. He should have asked Mr. Maclean, as to general cheques which were marked "Payable to cash," whether that implied that they were necessarily paid to Mr. Leopold in person.

Mr. Maclean was accordingly recalled. In answer to the question he said it did not necessarily imply that the cheques were paid to Leopold in person. The endorsement on them would probably be that of the person who received the money.

His Honour—If the proceeds of these bills had not been put to Leopold's account would there have been any money to pay these cheques if they were paid over the counter?—No.

Mr. Litchfield then rose to address the court. He said it was now his duty to sum up the evidence against the accused. Before proceeding to that he should like them to put from their minds anything that they might have heard before they came into Court, and confine themselves to the evidence itself. Counsel for the defence had on the opening day laid some foundation for the imputation that the firm of Ahrens and Co. had some knowledge of the accused's proceedings. No serious examination on that point had taken place, though some mild suggestion had been made that they had knowledge of the matter before the month of April; but there was nothing that could in any way establish the fact of such knowledge existing before that period. He would proceed to define the offence of fraud. Fraud was defined as deceiving a man so as to expose him to injury or to risk of injury. The question was—did Leopold for his own profit falsely state that he had shipped certain specific furs and thereby expose the Bank to risk of injury? The question as to what he obtained from that fraud would be another question. If Leopold for his own profit made this false statement to the Bank he (Mr. Litchfield) contended that he acted fraudulently and it would be no answer for him to say or to suggest that he meant to pay the money back or that he thought Messrs. Lampson and Co. would take up these bills. The question was—were these furs shipped or no? If they were not shipped the Bank was deprived of the security it otherwise would have possessed, a document of title representing furs shipped to London. If those furs were not shipped, and if Leopold represented to the Bank that they were, then he was guilty of fraud. This would be the first point, and the main point, for underlying all the statements in the counts of the indictment the Jury would find that everything came back to this stupendous fact—were these furs shipped or not? The bills of lading, the letters of the accused to the Bank, the policies of insurance, all represented that these furs had been shipped, and it was on those representations that the Bank had bought the accused's bill of exchange in accordance with the credit of Messrs. Lampson and Co. One could usually observe from the cross-examination the line of defence that was to be adopted. Up to the present time he had been unable to discover any specific line of defence in this case. He should consequently have to travel more lengthily than otherwise through a large portion of the evidence of the case, and should also have to address to the Jury considerably more argument that would otherwise have been necessary. If he became wearisome in that respect it would not be his fault. The only indication of a defence he could discover from the cross-examination tended to show that Leopold had said or suggested to Ahrens and Co. that he had been losing money over transactions outside his fur business, that in December last the price of furs had considerably risen, and that accused actually shipped in April furs for which bills of lading had been obtained in December. Mr. Litchfield then dealt in detail with the various counts in the indictment. After speaking of the dates of the alleged shipments he pointed out that a Japanese witness had stated that Mr. Leopold was in the habit of keeping signed bills of lading in his desk. That was a very praiseworthy action in itself, his getting ready bills of lading for goods which he might ship later on. Very praiseworthy, so long as he kept them in his desk, but when he took them to the bank and borrowed money on them it ceased to be praiseworthy and became criminal. There was no harm in a man practising signing cheques for £100,000 and imitating the signature of Baring Brothers, so long as he kept it to himself. There was no harm in a man amusing himself by writing calumnies on his neighbours so long as he did not publish them. It was when he tried to pass the cheque or to publish the calumnies that the acts became criminal. Proceeding, Mr. Litchfield pointed out that in 1897 the accused was indebted to the Bank in the sum of 40,746 yen, and he used the money he obtained for the furs bills of exchange to discharge his debt to the Bank. He would call the attention of the Jury to the evidence of Mr. Maclean and Mr. Fraser, who said that he might have been paid in cash for the proceeds of the bills of exchange, though it was possible that on the 31st December, the first date in the indictment, the Bank might have required—or might have expected—him to pay it back to the bank. To avoid the trouble of counting and paying over to him the amount in cash, and his paying it over into another department of the bank again the account was placed to his credit and debited to the bank. It was, however, as much a case of payment of what the accused asked for as if the money had actually been paid over to him. He pointed out that representations made to the employés of the Bank in their capacity of agents were equivalent to representations made to the Bank as a Corporation. Dealing with the case of the cheque to the Russo-Chinese Bank for a telegraphic transfer to Leopold's brother in London, Mr. Litchfield said that even if he was not right in supposing that the payment of the proceeds of the bills in the way he had described was a payment of money, on this count at any rate the accused was emphatically guilty of obtaining 28,000 yen for his use and benefit. He submitted also that on the eighth count of the indictment accused was clearly guilty. In regard to the transaction of the 7th April there was clear evidence that money was paid to accused on a cheque drawn by him to pay a bill of exchange in which the Bank was not interested, the bill of that date being only sent them by Lampson & Co. for collection. He admitted that they could not assume that a cheque until presented for payment or cancelled by the banker was the same as money, but he contended that after it had been presented for payment or had been cancelled by the banker it was the equivalent of money. He explained the clearing house system in use among bankers, and submitted that when the accounts of the banks were balanced and the total amounts due from one to another either paid or entered in accounts, that constituted payment of all the cheques included in the total. With regard to the fourth count, charging accused with false pretences against Hoffman, of the firm of Ahrens and Co., Nachf., he pointed out that a false statement might not necessarily be made in words but might be made by the acts of the accused, and he asked them to say that the accused, in laying bills of lading before Hoffman, as manager of the shipping department, did falsely pretend that the goods had been shipped, the bills of lading representing that furs had been shipped in good order and condition. Bills of lading filled in by a Japanese clerk on Leopold's instructions, and returned to Leopold afterwards and presented for signature by the partner when he knew that they did not represent what they purported to represent, viz, that they were to be shipped on or about a certain date—he submitted that the presentation of these bills of lading was a false pretence. A bill of lading was a valuable security within the meaning of the Larceny Act, and the witness Fraser had testified that it was these bills of lading that induced the Bank to purchase Leopold's bills. He thought there was little doubt that they were used and were intended to be used as a valuable security. As to the question of intent to defraud, was this done with the intention of exposing Ahrens and Co. to injury or risk of injury? It was. It caused a claim to be made of the Shipping Company of which they were the agents concerning the non-delivery of the furs, and it resulted in considerable sums having to be paid by Ahrens and Co. to Lampson and Co. for the non-delivery of these furs. They could not pry into the secret thoughts of a man; they could only judge his acts by the actual consequences and by the consequences which seemed probable and natural. The bills of lading were used for purposes of fraud, and had effected a fraud. He submitted that the witness Wismer was a witness of truth and that the line of cross-examination did not in the least shake his testimony. He testified that in one of his conversations with the accused Leopold said, "Ahrens and Co. must take up the bills." That might have been one small fact on which to found an argument that Ahrens and Co. were not altogether unaware of these transactions, but he (Mr. Litchfield) would submit that in face of the evidence—in face of the absolute denial of both Hoffman and Wismer that they were in cognizance of the fact that these bills of lading were being signed without the goods going forwarded—in face of that evidence he submitted that Leopold's remark to Mr. Wismer meant that he knew all along that he was certain that the signature of these bills of lading would recoil on Ahrens & Co., and that they would have to bear the final responsibility. If they agreed with him (Mr. Litchfield) on that point he should confidently submit that there could be no doubt of the actual intention of Leopold to commit these frauds with which he was charged.

The Court then adjourned for tiffin.

On resuming Mr. Terry commenced his speech for the defence. He said this case was not simply one of money. It was a question of a man's future, a man's reputation, a man's ruin perhaps, and under the circumstances he felt it his duty to place before the Jury a large number of points which he considered material, which he could not deal with except at length, and which he asked them to hear as patiently and considerably as they had heard the speeches for the prosecution. He had three preliminary remarks to address to them. The first was as to the scope and nature of the defence on which he relied. They were saved in that case one very disagreeable and perplexing class of questions, viz, as to how far witnesses could be believed. He for the defence accepted all the witnesses for the prosecution as men who spoke the truth so far as they remembered it, and in the main they probably remembered it correctly. He might perhaps except from that general statement the Japanese witness who did not know what "captain's copies" were and perhaps the witness that followed him. There was a man in Mark Twain who set such value on the truth that he never parted with any of it, and possibly that might be the case with one or other of those witnesses. But with these exceptions they had to rely on what the witnesses had told them; the primary questions of the case were not disputed. The question was what were the inferences in fact and law to be drawn from those primary facts. So far as he was concerned with fact he should ask them to draw certain inferences in favour of the accused. In some cases if the inference was a little narrow it was at least solid. He was not going to present Mr. Leopold as a man who had done no wrong. It must be admitted that he had been guilty of exceedingly blameworthy conduct. He would go further than that; he had been guilty of unlawful conduct. He (Mr. Terry) could not deny that. But that was not the question. There were many kinds of conduct which were blameworthy and were against the law, but which did not amount to fraud, and even when they had got into the region of undoubted fraud there were many kinds of conduct which did not come within the province of the criminal law. As to whether the law ought to punish all kinds of blameworthy conduct it was not for them to discuss, and even in criminal fraud there were many kinds of offences, and it was not their province to determine whether a man had done wrong, whether he had committed fraud—which he did not admit in this case—and not even if he had committed criminal fraud, but whether he had committed that branch of crime which was laid down in the indictments against him. He (Mr. Terry) did not say this with any purpose of suggesting that the accused might be guilty of any such other kinds of offences. He simply said this because when a man's conduct appeared to the Jury to be blameworthy they sometimes did not consider what was the particular kind of blameworthiness, whether it was that with which he was charged or some other kind. If they were quite certain that Leopold had committed some kind of criminal fraud, and it was not one mentioned in the indictment, they need not be afraid of committing any failure of justice by acquitting him, for there was no reason why he should not be indicted again on new charges. He simply put this before them, not that he admitted that any kind of crime had been committed, but to draw their attention to the fact that that they had to consider the special crime or fraud set down in the indictment and nothing else. They must also assume nothing against the defendant. It was not enough that the prosecution must prove a particular fact, but they must prove every particular fact which it was necessary for them to find out in order to return a verdict against the accused. The question might arise perhaps in the course of the discussion whether during the months of January and February any steamer of the N. D. Lloyd sailed between this port and Hongkong besides the steamer Hohenzollern. They might think their verdict depended in some measure on whether there was or was not. If they found it necessary that they must decide that question they must remember that the prosecution must prove every fact that it was necessary to prove. No evidence had been given at all on that subject and the fact must be taken in a manner favourable to the defendant. They could not convict the defendant upon the assumption that there was or was not any such steamer unless it was proved to them. And further they must not decide any question on private information which might have come before them, but simply and solely on the evidence before the court. That particular method of injustice was one which had made the Dreyfus trial a byeword throughout the world. Dreyfus was convicted by a tribunal acting on information which was not put in evidence before it. Those were the first of the preliminary points he wished to put before them—the scope of the defence and the manner in which the case must be proved. The second was the general view which ought to be taken of the case and of Mr. Leopold's conduct. That was important in two ways. In the first place, whatever the result of the trial, he did not wish Mr. Leopold to stand before the community in any worse light than he had done before. The second way in which it was important was that he should have to speaks of a number of particular facts which had been put in evidence, and the view the Jury would take of these facts and the inferences they would draw from them would be largely influenced by the general opinion they formed of Leopold's course and attitude in the matter. Admitting Leopold's transactions were improper transactions, admitting that he had done things which he ought not to have done, there were two possible ways in which they might regard the entire transactions. The first theory was that Leopold laid deep plans of felony with an entire knowledge and a deliberate scheme to defraud for his own benefit. The other view was that his irregularities, his improper conduct, had begun in carelessness, begun in irregular dealings for his own accommodation and for the convenience of his friends, and that owing to circumstances that he (Mr. Terry) should indicate he was led along further than he ever expected, without at any time ever having in his mind the deliberate intention of doing any wrong to anybody. They were all familiar with the stories of men—good men—who had gone wrong, men who had led respectable, upright, honourable lives, who were betayed into one false step, and, never intending to injure anybody, having no doubt that they could make everything right in the end, went on until a crash came. They had these two theories, and only these two. He was going to submit that Leopold never had any deliberate plan of injuring others. In fact he did not think the idea ever clearly presented itself to Leopold's mind. He thought with Leopold's easy-going and careless nature he never realised the gravity of what he was doing. In the first place he would refer them to one fact—the absolute openness with which he did everything. If he had formed a deliberate plan to defraud would he have set the clerks in Ahrens & Co.'s office to write out these incriminating documents and would he keep them in a drawer of his desk where everyone in the office knew they were? From the very beginning did he make the slightest attempt to conceal from anyone what he was doing? In the very form of the documents sent to the bank there was matter which would have exposed him to very awkward questions in the ordinary course of events, and he (Mr. Terry) did not understand why certain questions were not asked him. He (counsel) had no doubt in his own mind that if Leopold had been asked by Ahrens & Co. or by the Bank what he was doing he would have told them frankly. It was quite plain that he never tried to conceal anything. That was fatal to the theory of a deep-laid plan, but it was quite consistent with the other theory that he had placed before them—that he was led into this course of dealing, which he might have known to be irregular, but the gravity of which he never appreciated. It must be remembered, too, that if he was laying a deliberate plan he had a very limited time at his disposal. Of course if his plan was to cheat, to simply get money for himself, and steal that money and enjoy it, it was evident that he must leave Yokohama. The utmost time he could reckon on was two or three months. He might perhaps reckon on three months before the matter was exposed. He knew it was a criminal scheme of fraud, and he must have intended to make all that he could by rushing drafts through the bank in a short time and then going away. The theory was inconsistent with his staying in Japan up to April and with his sending in March to Lampsons a large sum of money in part-payment of shipments which he had failed to make. Lampson's drew on him for a large sum and he paid the bill.

His Honour—The facts are contrary to that. Lampson drew the bill in London in January. Lampson could not have drawn on the 1st January against any of these shipments.

Mr. Terry—He could have drawn against former shipments. But I will change the wording of it. At any rate he sent this money to Lampson, and we know that he began to ship furs in which he was behind. There was no reason why he should have given a cent's worth of that if he had intended to get all he could get. Moreover, after the whole thing was discovered he had several months to go, but in that time he was helping to realise many of his assets as far as he could to make good what he had done. He did not think the Jury would conclude from that that there was any deliberate and intentional scheme of fraud. He believed they would recognise that it was the ordinary case, the common case, the case that occurred every day, of a man beginning irregular practices carelessly and running on until he got more deeply involved than he thought possible without any guilty consciousness of the course of events. It appeared from the evidence of one of the witnesses that as a matter of convenience bills of lading were sometimes prepared and handed in for signature before the firm received the blue forms from the shippers.

Mr. Lowder—I don't recollect it.

His Honour—I must say I don't remember that. (Referring to his notes) All I have is a question to a Japanese witness. "As a matter of accommodation did Mr. Leopold issue bills of lading to shippers before they came with their blue forms?" Answer: "I don't know."

Mr. Terry—That was not the point. It was "Were not bills of lading occasionally made out and sent in for signature before the blue forms came in?"

His Honour—It is not of importance any way.

His Honour—I think you are right—that it is of no importance.

Mr. Terry, continuing, said the witness Fukushima had stated that he had known cases of bills of lading being made out before goods were shipped. Harmssen had said that in the case of certain silk shippers bills of lading had been not only signed but actually delivered to shippers before the goods were shipped.

His Honour—It was very unusual. He said there might have been one case.

Mr. Terry—Yes, he said he only knew of one case. I suggest that it was done in some cases for the accommodation of his friends and certainly for his own accommodation. It was a fair inference that when he began this course he had the goods in his possession ready to ship and he considered it not of very great importance whether the bills were made out to-day or the day after. According to Fukushima this was going on at least as far back as October. It was very probable that it went back farther still. Apparently there was nothing very wrong before December 31st 1897, and yet probably before that time Leopold had taken to the practice of getting out bills of lading before actually shipping goods. They must consider the inherent probability of it all. Before this time it was only a matter of anticipating the actual shipments a little. There was no doubt in his (counsel's) mind, and he thought there would be no doubt in the Jury's.

Mr. Lowder—Really, I must interrupt. The learned counsel has stated several times that "certain things are clear to his mind."

His Honour—It is not allowable, Mr. Terry, by the etiquette of the English bar, for counsel to give their own impressions to the Jury in that way.

Mr. Terry—I beg your pardon. I was not aware of it. I will put the matter differently. Putting these facts altogether, he continued, the probable inference was that up to December Leopold's irregularities simply consisted in issuing bills of lading for goods which were not shipped immediately but which were in fact actually shipped afterwards. Of course it was impossible to say where the goods were at the time. They might have been goods that he had contracted for but had not got delivered. It was an inference that might be drawn with some probability that he might have gone so far as to take out bills of lading with the object of getting money from the bank to pay for the goods. That appeared to be the state of things up to the 31st December—a state of things that could not be justified, but very far short of fraud. In December and January it was quite plain that he took out bills of lading for goods which were not shipped at that time. That included the goods whose general numbers ran from 1 to 105 and therefore the different shipments 46 to 105 which were charged in this indictment and which were not actually shipped. They had evidence to establish another point for the defence theory. Before that Mr. Leopold had been getting advance bills of lading and apparently shipping goods. In December and January he did not ship the goods, but he shipped part of them about the 14th April—part of the first lot 1 to 45, which were excluded from the present indictment. He asked them to draw the inference that if the accused had the goods in his possession he would have shipped them. The inference was that in December and January he went a step farther then he had gone before. He not only took out bills of lading in advance of shipping goods, but he took them out for goods which he had not in his possession, but which he expected to have and intended to ship when he got them. Was there anything in the evidence which could give them a clue as to what it was that stood in Leopold's way and prevented him shipping these goods? It appeared in the evidence—and this was a fact that explained the whole of this miserable business—that Leopold, not content with his legitimate business as clerk to Ahrens & Co. and his export business, was extending himself in various direction. He was exporting wall paper, and must manufacture wall paper, he was interested in a saw mill which appeared to be quite an elaborate affair, in a lighter company, in land speculations, in a coal business. All these businesses were in Japanese hands. He (Mr. Terry) suggested that Leopold, being thus spread out in business, and having got money through selling his bills to the bank to purchase his furs, did not purchase the furs, but found the money drain away in other directions, and in enterprises on which he had very reasonable expectations of counting. The bills on Lampson were four months bills, and the man would say to himself that in four months he could pull himself round and make things all right again. It was improper, and he (Mr. Terry) was not justifying it. About the 1st February Leopold began to pull up. He found he had gone as far as it was safe for him to go. He recommenced his shipments, and sent two large amounts of money home through the Chartered Bank and the Russo-Chinese Bank, and there was a reasonable supposition that this was to make up to Lampson some of the amount of furs which he had not shipped. He found he could not send furs, and must send money. In March he shipped goods by the Crefeld which went into the bill of lading issued for the date of April 7th.

Mr. Lowder—I don't follow you.

Mr. Terry—March 7th steamer Crefeld. LI in a diamond 98, 195 198. They went into the April bill of lading. Mr. Terry continued that what the evidence would justify the Jury in inferring was that Leopold had taken out bills of lading for his own convenience for goods which he afterwards intended to ship and that in January and February he was unable to ship them. In April he was beginning some shipments when the Chartered Bank seized some of his furs which he would otherwise have shipped. He was beginning to pull up when sickness came. He (Mr. Terry) had given them only a probability, but in the favour of the defendant a reasonable probability was as good as a certainty. The prosecution had to give them certainties, but it was quite enough for the defence if they could present a probable account of the facts in evidence. As to the third point in his preliminary observations, it was regarding the manner in which the case had been put before them in the indictment. There were 12 counts, and the sixth count contained five specifications, which as a matter of strict form were each a separate count. If they regarded them as such they had thus 16 distinct charges against Leopold. There were only seven transactions charged. Six of these referred to the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, and the other to Ahrens and Co. The six transactions with the Bank were dated as follows:—December 31st, January 10th, February 9th, February 15th, February 19th, and April 7th. All the counts except the fourth referred to these alleged criminal transactions between Leopold and the Bank. He would speak of these as the Bank counts. The fourth count referred to the alleged transactions between Leopold and Ahrens and Co., represented by Hoffman. The bank counts formed three groups. The first, second, third, and sixth he should distinguish by the name of money counts. They charged that Leopold obtained money by false pretences from the Bank. The second he should distinguish as the Chartered Bank counts. They were seven and eight, and charged that Leopold procured money by a transfer through the Russo-Chinese Bank and the Chartered Bank. The third group comprised the fifth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelvth counts. These did not charge Leopold with obtaining money, but were drawn under a different statute, which dealt with obtaining credit under false pretences. He should speak of these as the credit counts.' This finished his introductory remarks. His main argument would come under four heads. He would speak first of the money counts, then of the different credit counts, then of the Chartered counts, then of the Ahrens count. The money counts were under the 88th section of the Larceny Act. He pointed out that it was necessary for the prosecution to prove that Leopold obtained money by making representations that were false, and that they were made with the intention of defrauding. They must prove every single one of these counts, and he intended to argue that they could not prove one of them. If he could show that any single one of them had not been proved the whole fell to the ground. There was only one representation made that was of importance—the shipment of the furs. In all these counts except the third—in the first, second, and sixth, it was stated that false representations were made to Mr. Bevis. He pointed out that in the evidence it was clearly shown that the bills were handed to Mr. Fraser, that Mr. Bevis made the original contract to buy the bills, but that after that he saw nothing of them except the bill of the 7th April. There was no evidence that these representations were made to Mr. Bevis in person. Mr. Terry proceeded to argue at great length that Mr. Fraser could not be taken to be the agent of Mr. Bevis, that both were servants of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank Corporation, and that in fact the representations were made to Mr. Fraser and not to Mr. Bevis. He argued also that they could not be said to be made to Mr. Bevis as the representative of the Corporation. The representations reached Mr. Fraser and were considered by him.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

His Honour said Mr. Terry might take it from him that he should tell the Jury that these representations did not reach Mr. Bevis.

Mr. Terry—I shall request your Honour to charge the Jury that there is no evidence that these representations came before Mr. Bevis, and that that is fatal to the prosecution.

His Honour—I will make a note of it.

Mr. Terry—Suppose that to be the case—suppose further that as a matter of law representations made to one man cannot be said to be made to another—is that fatal to the case?

His Honour—I will consider the point. In some respects I am with.

Mr. Terry—Your Honour's point is that as a matter of law the representations may be considered as made to the person who would act and has acted on them?

His Honour—Yes, and may be considered as made to a great many other people. Representations made to Mr. Fraser may not have been intended for him at all. There is a distinction between the person whom the representation was intended to reach and the person who received and acted on it. The letter was written to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, and was in answer to a letter written by the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation. To what natural person is the letter to the Corporation addressed?

Mr. Terry—I should say it is not addressed to any natural person at all. If it were a partnership it would different, but the Bank in this instance was a corporate person, and the letter addressed to the Bank must be a letter addressed to it as a person.

His Honour—But it must have been the intention that it would reach some natural person, or it would not be sent.

Mr. Terry—Yes, to some natural person, but there is no ground for any inference, and there is no evidence that he had any particular natural person in mind as the person to whom it was intended to go. His intention was that it should go to any person who was competent to represent the banking company. The person to whom he intended to make the representation is one, and the person to whom he actually made it is quite another. Mr. Leopold wrote that letter and handed it over to the bank, and undoubtedly intended it should be received by some natural person. But there is no reason to suppose he had any particular natural person in his mind. Mr. Terry proceeded to argue that in point of fact the representations were made to Mr. Fraser, and contended that the count was bad and must fail. He claimed a verdict on this series of counts. He then proceeded to the point whether, even if such representations were made, were they false? He pointed out that substantial accuracy was all the law demanded in a man's statements, and it made no practical difference, in the question of false pretences, if goods went forward, whether they went in the steamer named in the bill of lading or in another steamer. The prosecution had proved beyond reasonable doubt that certain furs were not sent by the Hohenzollern. Had it proved beyond reasonable doubt that they were not shipped by any other steamer?

His Honour—It is for you to prove that they went by some other steamer if they did not by that steamer. It would be a mistake for me to allow such an argument to be used at all. I will tell the Jury that as to there not having gone by the Hohenzollern there is enough evidence. It is very seldom indeed that I interrupt counsel, especially counsel for the defence, and you may be sure that I feel very strongly on that point.

His Honour added that it was the duty of the prosecution to show that the goods had not gone by the steamer that they were represented to have gone by, but they were not called on to prove that they had not gone by any other ship.

Mr. Terry—But when it appears that some did go forward by some other steamer?

His Honour—It would come to this—that they would have to prove that they had not got be by any steamer leaving Yokohama.

Mr. Terry—The fact that proof is not easy is not the question.

His Honour—You may take it from me that I shall tell the Jury so.

Mr. Terry then proceeded to argue on a third point—assuming the goods were never sent forward did the defendant intend to defraud? He dealt with the point at great length and quoted two cases Queen v. Garret and Peak v. Gurney for his Honour's consideration of the points of law involved.

The Court then rose.

THURSDAY, 15th December, 1898.

On the Court reassembling on Thursday morning Mr. Terry resumed his address for the defence. He continued his argument that "intention" must be held to include a wish as well as an expectation of the result produced. He argued that carelessness, even gross carelessness, was not in law intent. He quoted a case against the directors of a bank for misrepresentation, in which the jury found that the statements made were false, and found that the directors were guilty of gross negligence, but acquitted them of intent to defraud. Intent to defraud was rather a complicated state of mind. In the first place there must be an intent to make a representation; in the second place an attempt to bring the representation to the person or class of persons for whom it was intended; in the third place there must be an intent that the representation should be understood in a particular sense, on which point he would speak bye and bye; the fourth point was that it should be believed; the fifth that there was a knowledge or belief that it was false. These points were involved in the word intent. To make it intent to defraud they had to go into other considerations—an intent that it should be acted upon, and the fact that its being so acted upon produced a certain result. He had already spoken incidentally of one point. It must be proved that the defendent intended to make a representation to Mr. Bevis. He should show that he had no such intention; that he intended legally to make his representations to the Bank, and practically to any person competent to attend to it, and not to Mr. Bevis at all. He would deal first with Leopold's intention as to the meaning which he intended the documents to convey to the bank. In all representations there were three meanings to be considered—the intended meaning, the accepted meaning, which might be entirely different from each other, and the proper or true meaning, which might be different from either. When they were speaking of intent to defraud they must remember that intended meaning was the only meaning that was of any importance. Defendant made a representation to the Bank which the Bank understood to mean that the goods were actually shipped. He (Mr. Terry) might admit for the present that was a reasonable construction for the Bank to put upon it. But he thought that the fact would show that the defendant had no intention to put this construction upon it. The bills of lading showed on their faces in some cases that the goods had not been shipped. He pointed out that the custom of putting copies of the bill of lading on board the ship before she left port was well known in the mercantile world, and it was to be presumed that it was well-known to the officers of the Bank, or, at any rate, that Leopold presumed it to be well-known. When Leopold presented on December 31st bills of lading for the steamer Hohenzollern, which left on December 25th, it was evident that the steamer must have left without one of her proper documents, and therefore, by inference, the goods had not been shipped. If Leopold was concocting schemes of fraud would he have sent to the Bank documents which on the face of them might have led to very awkward inquiries? It would be extremely natural for the Bank to send for him and ask him what the document meant. If he had been laying a scheme of fraud he would have foreseen this, and if these bills of lading had been purely fraudulent he would have avoided the chance of detection, by seeing that his documents bore the proper date. It must be remembered that he was acquainted with the whole course of shipping business, and it must be inferred that he could not have overlooked such a very dangerous fact as that these papers bore on them the intimation that the goods had not gone forward by the Hohenzollern on the 25th. Mr. Terry pointed out that the words of the bill of lading were to go forward "by the Hohenzollern or other steamer," not "and other steamer," which left a clear alternative that the goods might go by the Hohenzollern or by some other ship. Mr. Terry then went on to argue that the Bank had been lenient before the period in question in its dealings with Mr. Leopold, and had allowed him for six months previous to December a very large overdraft. He was allowed to draw cheques against Lampson's bills before he put them into the Bank, and it would be very natural on his part if he argued that if the Bank was willing to cash cheques first and take his bills afterwards, they would not be likely to make any serious objections if he presented bills of lading and sold his bills before he actually shipped goods. He (Mr. Terry) submitted that when he presented these bills of lading Leopold intended to make the shipments, but that he was prevented from making them. It was of course gross carelessness, outrageous carelessness, but he argued that Leopold did not intend that the Bank should draw the inference that goods had been shipped on December 25th for which bills of lading were signed on December 31st and similarly with other dates. The more probable inference was that he had no definite or clear intention at all, supposing the Bank would not mind whether he obtained the money on the goods a few days sooner or later. There was possibly room for a doubt whether the Bank ought to have put the construction on the bills that they did, viz., that the goods had been shipped, but at any rate there was room for the supposition that Leopold had no intention that they should bear that construction. In the next place did the accused intend the representations should be acted upon? Undoubtedly he did intend that the Bank should act upon them, but he did not intend that either Lampson or Ahrens and Company or any other person should act upon them. If the intention was held to be criminal it could only be held as an intention with reference to the Bank. In the next place, as to the intent to produce a certain result—did Leopold intend that the Bank should not get the security for its loan that it appeared to have? The loan was not one to Leopold, but to Lampson, in the sense that Lampson was liable in the first place for the amount of the bills. Lampson was bound to accept the bills of exchange whether the furs were shipped or not. Therefore the value of the Bank's security was not impaired as far as Lampson was concerned. He argued this point at great length, and quoted the decision of an American Court in a case which he held to be analagous. He contended that the bills, although mercantile bills, gave no more security to the Bank than the credit of Lampson and Leopold. The documents did not increase the security, nor had the bank the security of the furs, for during the greater part of the life of the bills the documents and the furs had passed out of the control of the Bank. There was no intention to defraud, then, for two reasons. First the intention to defraud would mean that Leopold intended the Bank to understand that the goods had been shipped. If Leopold intended to ship them by the next steamer the Court would direct them that that was not fraud.

His Honour—No, I will not—I think it right you should understand that I shall not accept that proposition. His Honour pointed out that the representation made was not that the goods would be shipped in futuro, but that they had been shipped. The bills represented that the goods had either been shipped on board the Hohenzollern, or that they had been received by the agents of the Hohenzollern for shipment.

Mr. Terry claimed that if the bills contained simply the representation that the goods would be shipped that would not be fraudulent. He did not think there was any difference between himself and the Court on the question of law; they might differ on questions of fact.

His Honour—I should be misleading you, Mr. Terry, if I said that. Do I understand you to argue that these bills mean that the goods may be received from Ahrens and Co. for subsequent shipment, or that they have been received?

Mr. Terry—I think they simply meant that the goods may be forwarded by a subsequent steamer.

His Honour—Do you wish to argue that a bill of lading is capable of the representation that Mr. Leopold has promised to give Ahrens and Co. to cases of furs for shipment, or that he has given them?

Mr. Terry—I think it is capable of several meanings. The particular point which I asserted was that the intention in Leopold's mind was no more than to convey to the Bank a statement that these were goods either shipped by the last steamer or to be shipped by the next steamer.

His Honour—And that they were at the time in question where?

Mr. Terry—In that particular meaning it would not say where they were. I am not arguing the true and reasonable meaning. I say that, considering Mr. Leopold's habits of dealing, considering his unbusinesslike methods, it is a reasonable view that he intended no more than to assert that they had been or were going to be put forward.

His Honour—Do you contend that it is a reasonable and possible explanation that Mr. Leopold intended and expected the Bank to believe that the goods had not gone, and that Ahrens and Co., as agents of the steamship company, had no control over them.

Mr. Terry—The view I presented to the Jury was that he had in fact no clear expectation of any kind in his mind, that he had no firm and definite intention to represent to the Bank that the goods had not been shipped, that he did not ask the question of himself what the Bank would understand by this, and that as far as his intention went it did not extend to making any statement whatever as to the past or present situation of the goods.

After further discussion of the same point the Court adjourned for tiffin.

On resuming, Mr. Terry argued once more the point that the representations were not made to Mr. Bevis, but to Mr. Fraser, and that Mr. Fraser could not be regarded as Mr. Bevis's Agent. He contended at great length, with regard to the money counts of the indictment, that it was not proved that Leopold had obtained money from the Bank. The money was credited to him, and a certain disposition was made of the amount with which he was credited. The crediting of him with that amount was not a payment of money, it was a mere promise of payment. The promise of a bank was more valuable than the promise of an individual, but there was no difference legally between the promise of a bank and the promise of the poorest beach coomber on the Bund. The entry in the Bank's books did not amount to a payment of money to Leopold. Mr. Terry then addressed himself to the Chartered Bank counts. With regard to the eighth count he objected that it was invalid on the ground that it did not mention the name of the person to whom the representations were made.

His Honour—Mr. Crown Prosecutor, what have you to say to that? (After reference to books) Look at this case of Queen v. Sowerby.

Mr. Litchfield looked at the case, and then remarked that a Corporation had a right to be represented by one of its public officers, and he submitted that a representation made to a Corporation was essentially a representation made to its chief officer or one of its public officers. In this case it was made to the manager of the Bank.

His Honour—Yes, but where does the indictment name the manager?

Mr. Litchfield—It doesn't mention him. This count is drawn differently from the other counts. His letter for the advance was addressed to the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

His Honour—But you do not say that he pretended ■ the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank. In the third count you do, but in this count you don't. Must you not put in the indictment that he did falsely pretend to somebody?

Mr. Litchfield added a few words, but his Honour cut his remarks short with: The indictment ought to say that the representations were addressed to some one and also that they were received by some one, and I shall accordingly quash that count of the indictment.

Mr. Terry then addressed himself to the remaining Chartered Bank count—the seventh. He argued that it was not proved that any money was paid to the Russo-Chinese Bank at all. The evidence showed that the money was not paid to the Russo-Chinese Bank, but to the Chartered Bank for the use of the defendant. The party mentioned in the indictment ought to have been the Chartered Bank and not the Russo-Chinese Bank. The count was under the 89th. Section of the Larceny Act., which laid down that money paid to a third person for the use of the defendant should be considered as money paid to the defendant. He argued, however, that no money was paid, that it was simply an adjustment of credits, a setting off of one debt against another, and that was not a payment of money.

Mr. Terry then proceeded to discuss the credit counts, the fifth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelvth. He pointed out that these were brought under a different Statute, the Debtors' Act, and that though no fraudulent intent was alleged in the wording of the count he took it for granted that such fraudulent intent was inferred. He repeated the arguments he had already made use of in considering the money counts to the effect that Leopold did not make his representations as alleged to Mr. Bevis. He submitted that objection must be fatal to these counts also. As to the question of incurring liability alleged in the indictment he pointed out that it was alleged that Leopold incurred a certain liability in yen. He (Mr. Terry) had particularly asked Mr. Fraser about that, and he had replied that in case of the bill not being accepted in London and coming back to Leopold for payment he could not state what sum in yen would have to be paid. It was a contingent liability to pay in sterling the amount of the bill if dishonoured. The amount of that sterling liability could not be exactly known, and the amount to be paid in yen could not be known at all. The statute directed that the sum for which the accused incurred liability should be stated in exact figures of gold and silver coins or banknotes, and therefore when the indictment stated that the defendant incurred a liability for a fixed sum in yen and Mr. Fraser testified that that was only the price at which they bought his bill, and that the liability he incurred could not be stated exactly, he contended the actual liability was not proved. That inference was fatal, he thought, to the count. What was alleged was that defendant incurred liability for a fixed, definite sum in yen, and what was proved was that he incurred a contingent liability for a sum in sterling which was not known. Mr. Terry went on to speak of the nature of the liability incurred. It was not a liability, but a possibility of liability. If the bill was duly honoured—as it in fact was—there would never have been a question of liability at all, but for the present case.

His Honour—Was he not under immediate liability to repay the money, and to be sued if the actual facts were known?

Mr. Terry—Yes, on one condition—that they rescinded the contract.

His Honour—He was under a liability to do it, and they did not require him to rescind the contract. Would not suing him be rescission itself?

Mr. Terry argued that the rescission and the handing back of the draft were necessary.

His Honour—You mean immediately they sent the draft to Europe their power of suing the accused was suspended?

Mr. Terry—As long as the money is in the bank they could not sue.

His Honour—There I am with you. As to the 40,000 yen they could not sue, but they could sue for anything he got in respect to that credit.

Mr. Terry—They could not sue him without he had got it?

His Honour—They did not require to sue him as long as they had not parted with their money.

Mr. Terry—They evidently did not require, but they could not possibly do it. They had no basis for suing.

Mr. Terry continued to argue on the question of credit, trying to show that instead of the Bank being the creditor of Leopold Leopold was actually the creditor of the Bank.

His Honour, however, emphatically dissented from this view, and said he should tell the jury to dissent from it. If Mr. Terry thought he was doing any good he could of course go on.

Mr. Terry—In this instance, your Honour, I shall go on.

The argument was accordingly continued and it was not till five that Mr. Terry left the question, and addressed himself to the last remaining count, that referring to the alleged false representation to Huffman.

Shortly after five the Jury asked for a recess of ten minutes.

At the conclusion of this Mr. Terry entered on the discussion of the Ahrens count, urging that as Ahrens were not the parties legally responsible they could not be subjects of an attempt to defraud. It was true that they had met part of these bills, but they had done that for business reasons and not because they were legally liable.

Mr. Terry's argument was still unfinished when the Court rose about six o'clock. He stated that he should take about twenty minutes in the morning.

The Judge—Say an hour and a half.

FRIDAY, 16th DECEMBER, 1898.

The hearing was resumed on Friday morning.

On the Court reassembling Mr. Terry continued his argument on the Ahrens count, contending that Ahrens and Co. were not liable under the bills of exchange, and that therefore Leopold could not be held to have defrauded them. It might be urged that Ahrens and Co. came under the German law, and not under the English law, but in that case the German law must be proved. If it were proved that Ahrens and Co. were legally defrauded it must be proved that Leopold had an intention to defraud them. It was legally impossible to intend a result which was legally impossible. The Bank was the only person to whom the injury could be done, if any could be intended, and any injury that might follow to Ahrens & Co. was only a subsequent injury removed beyond the question of intent. With regard to another point, it was suggested in the argument for the prosecution that the crediting of money to Leopold and placing it in satisfaction of his existing debt to the bank was equivalent to paying money over the counter and his paying it back.

His Honour—You need not trouble yourself with that.

Mr. Terry said he must next refer to his statement that the money counts were not good under section 89 of the Larceny Act, which provided that in cases where money was paid to anyone else than the defendant the name of the person to whom it was paid must be alleged. In regard to the credit counts he contended that in charges of obtaining credit fraudulently the credit must be a credit in which the defendant was the trusted party, and not one in which the Bank gave him credit. He then summarised his general claims as follows:—On the money count, I make the following claims: That it is not proved that any representations were made to Mr. Bevis. That on the question of intent to defraud there is at least room for a reasonable doubt as to the intended meaning of the representation, and as to the effect intended to be produced on the bank—whether the bank did not get in substance what it intended to get—and that under the doctrine in Queen v. Garrett there can be an intent to defraud anybody except the bank. That there is no evidence that Mr. Leopold obtained any money—first that the credit on the books of the bank was not money; secondly because it was not proved that any one of Mr. Leopold's cheques was paid in money—

His Honour—I am against you there, Mr. Terry.

Mr. Terry—I am not arguing now, I am simply stating my arguments. In the third place, that the payment to any other person is not proved under this count because the names of the payes are not alleged. These are my arguments on the money counts. On the seventh count my claims are as follows:—That no representations were made to Mr. Bevis: that intention to defraud has not been proved as before; that there is no evidence that money was paid to the Russo-Chinese Bank for Mr. Leopold; that the clearing house transaction with the Chartered Bank did not amount to the payment of money—there was no evidence that the Russo-Chinese Bank ever obtained more than a book credit with the Chartered Bank; that the payment of the Chartered Bank for the use of the Russo-Chinese Bank will not support the allegation that money was paid to the Russo-Chinese Bank—the name of the actual payee must be given. On the credit counts my claims are as follows:—That no representations were made to Mr. Bevis, and that Mr. Bevis did not buy the bills, that the defendant did not incur the liability alleged in the indictment or any liability in the sense of the statute and that the credit on the books of the Bank was not a credit within the meaning of the statute. On the Ahrens count my claims are that the intent to defraud is not proved because (1st) there is some evidence that Mr. Leopold supposed that the firm knew what he was doing; (2nd) that Ahrens and Co. did not incur any liability and therefore could not be legally defrauded, and therefore as a matter of law Leopold could not intend to defraud them; (3rd) that if Mr. Leopold had any fraudulent intent it did not extend beyond the obtaining of money from the Bank.

His Honour asked Mr. Terry to repeat his definition of intent to defraud.

This Mr. Terry did at length.

His Honour—There is one point that has not been mentioned by the prosecution, Mr. Terry. Suppose that I come to the conclusion that your argument on the subject of the representation to Mr. Bevis is correct, is the accused entitled to acquittal?

Mr. Terry—Without doubt. The question might then arise—

His Honour—I think you probably understand me.

Mr. Terry—The question may then arise whether the indictment can be amended.

His Honour—No. But I can tell them to find him guilty on some other offence. It is the question of attempt.

Mr. Terry—I am glad your Honour drew my attention to that. I had that question in my mind, but it escaped me. With the money counts, the question of whether the defendant attempted to obtain money from the Bank I think would not at all affect that point. If the indictment had charged him not with obtaining money, but with attempting to obtain money, it would be necessary to prove that he made false pretences, and, if they were alleged to be made to a person to whom they were not made it would be as much an acquittal for the attempt as for obtaining. In either case it must be alleged that he made false pretences to some person who must be named in the indictment correctly. I do not see that it makes any difference at all between the attempt and the actual accomplishment.

His Honour drew Mr. Terry's attention to a case in which a man was held guilty of attempting to injure another by means of a letter, though the letter never reached its destination.

Mr. Terry—In this case he intended that the letter should reach the person. But in the case of Leopold there is no evidence that the defendant intended that the letter should reach Bevis at all. He simply intended that it should go to some agent of the Bank, to any natural person competent to receive them.

Mr. Terry concluded his address, which had extended altogether over some eleven hours, by thanking the Jury for their patient and thoughtful attention to the case.

The Judge, in summing up, said that owing to the thorough manner in which the case had been presented his duties were made light, and he hoped to be able to discharge them without very much further claim on their time. There were twelve counts in the indictment, of which the eighth had already been struck out, and of the remaining eleven he should at present ask their attention to only four. The first he should consider was the fourth, which, taking the nomenclature of the learned counsel for the defence, he should describe as the Ahrens count. That was the count with regard to the signing of the bills of lading. In that count the prisoner was charged with inducing Hoffman to write the name of the firm of Ahrens and Co. on two separate bills of lading. He was charged with doing so by false pretences, and it was also charged that he intended to use the bills of lading as a valuable security and that he did so with intent to defraud Ahrens and Co. Now it was not, and it could not be denied, that the accused procured the signature of Ahrens and Co., by Hoffman. Though there was no written representation there were acts of conduct to prove it, and there was no doubt that by sending in bills of lading in the ordinary course to be signed they were procured to be signed. Indeed this was not denied. By these bills of lading accused made a representation that the goods were either shipped or had gone to the Pier Company for shipment. It was suggested that there was some evidence that the accused might possibly not have meant that. The grounds on which that had been suggested were, he understood, that the accused kept back the Captain's copies of the bills of lading, and put them in his drawer, and it was proved in evidence that one person at any rate in the office knew what he was doing, and it was suggested that the accused may possibly have inferred from that fact that it would be known to others in the office, and that it had come to Mr. Hoffman's notice, and that in sending in the bills of lading Mr. Hoffman would really not think that the goods had been shipped at all or might not think so. That was denied by Mr. Huffman, and also by Mr. Harmssen, and they had to weigh the probability of it. Did the accused honestly believe that time after time when he sent in bills of lading to the partners' office that those partners understood that they were signing bills of lading for goods which had not been shipped? To attribute such a belief to the accused would be startling. Whether that effect was produced on his mind it was for the Jury to determine, but it was impossible for a Judge in stating the facts of the case not to give some indication of his own mind. As to the question of intent to defraud it was, as counsel pointed out, impossible to give direct evidence of the prisoner's state of mind: they could only judge by circumstantial evidence. As a matter of fact did the prisoner in this case intend to defraud Ahrens and Co.? They might dismiss at once from their minds the question of whether Ahrens and Co. were not legally liable. There was no question but that Ahrens and Co. felt themselves in a position in which they were compelled to pay money in consequence of having signed these bills of lading. As a matter of fact they were injured by the action of the accused, and injured very materially from the moment these bills went to the bank. The accused's act submitted them to risk of loss certainly, it was calculated to injure them in many ways. Next, did accused intend it? They must first dismiss from their minds all question of whether he wished it. Of course the accused did not wish to injure his employers: what he wished was to get money. The general presumption of the law was in favour of innocence in the absence of evidence of guilt, but as men seldom did unlawful acts with innocent intentions the law inferred that every unlawful act was done with unlawful intention unless the contrary were proved. The counsel for the accused had admitted that these acts were highly improper and unlawful. The law presumed that what was unlawful was intended to be unlawful unless the contrary appeared. The presumption, which was as much the presumption of common sense as of law, was that in doing what he did the accused acted with fraudulent intent—that was to say, if they found that he intended Mr. Hoffman to believe that these goods had been shipped he intended that with fraudulent intent. It was presumed that every sane man of full age contemplated the probable and natural consequences of his acts. The fact that the accused intended to pay back the money was no defence whatever to a charge of fraud. Fraud consisted in the injury done at the time by the specified act, and the fact that the person committing the fraud intended to remedy it at some future time was no defence. The motive was no defence. If accused had wanted to supply money to his friends or spend it in charity that would be no answer to the intended fraud. If they found that the natural and probable consequences of the accused's act in obtaining the security of these bills of lading were to injure Ahrens and Co. either pecuniarily or in their credit as merchants, and that the accused contemplated such consequences, or unless they had some evidence that he did not contemplate such consequences, they would find accused guilty. If they found that he intended Mr. Hoffmann to believe that the goods had not been shipped, or he believed that Mr. Hoffmann would believe that they had not been shipped, then they would find him not guilty. If, again, they believed that he intended Mr. Hoffmann to believe that the goods were shipped and they could find any other explanation of his conduct than that he expected injury to happen to Ahrens and Co., then they would find him not guilty. With regard to the first and sixth counts, which were money counts, they could take into consideration with them the Russo-Chinese Bank count. They had this in common, that they charged against the accused that he procured something by false representations. In the first and sixth counts it was alleged that he procured certain sums of money, in the seventh count that he obtained payment of a certain sum of money to other people on his behalf. In the first two it was alleged that he falsely represented to one Herbert Maurice Bevis that he had shipped goods, the said Herbert Maurice Bevis being manager of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank. All he had said in the other case as to the intent to defraud applied here. By accepting the statements as to the furs being shipped when they were not shipped the Bank lost the security it intended to have for a time at any rate—it was placed in a worse position that it understood. The Bank was entitled to determine for itself what amount of security it required, and it required the security of these documents, and if those documents did not represent goods which had been shipped the Bank was in that sense defrauded. If the Bank was not defrauded was anybody defrauded? The three persons who might be defrauded were the Bank, Lampson, and Ahrens and Company, and it did not matter which of the three was actually defrauded. They might put away the question of the prisoner intending to set himself right. He had been unable to set matters right, as it appeared in evidence, and all the persons mentioned were entitled to the knowledge of the facts before they placed themselves in the position in which the act of the prisoner put them. His Honour discussed at length the question whether the prisoner knew the statement was untrue when he made it. In the letter to the Bank he spoke of the goods as "shipped" on board the Hohenzollern, and he put it to them to decide whether the prisoner, in making that statement, knew it to be untrue. Dealing with the question to whom the representations were addressed his Honour pointed out that with the exception of the bills of the 7th April it was clear that Mr. Bevis, the manager of the Bank, never considered them, or read the statements contained in the letters on the bill of lading. He was clearly not the person to whom the representations were made as alleged in the indictment, and therefore on the first and sixth counts they would return a verdict of "not guilty" of obtaining money. The same verdict must be given on the 7th count, as to obtaining money to be paid. That did not conclude the matter, however. It was shown that he had attempted to obtain money, and His Honour put it to the Jury that they had to consider whether these representations, though they did not reach Mr. Bevis as manager, yet they might be intended to reach him, and that would be attempting to obtain money by false pretences, presuming them to come to a conclusion that the pretences were false and that Leopold knew them to be false. He pointed out that the mere passing of money from one account to another was not obtaining money, and therefore with regard to the charge of obtaining one amount of 42,816 yen, the chief portion of which was absorbed in discharging his indebtedness, they would dismiss that sum from their minds. He did not obtain that sum in the sense of the indictment. But there was a sum of 1,500 yen or so over and above in this case, and in the other cases there appeared to be no or practically no indebtedness at the time the sterling was carried to the account. That amount that he drew against by cheque could be deemed the obtaining of money, whether the money was paid over the counter to himself, or to anybody, or by a banker's payment. That also covered the 7th count. He was charged with obtaining money he had paid to the Russo-Chinese Bank. If they had made up their minds in other respects as to that transaction they might take it from him (his Honour) that the money was paid to the Russo-Chinese Bank on behalf of the accused. Those were the only counts which he thought it would be necessary to call their attention to. If they had any reasonable doubt—he did not mean a doubt such as would get them out of the difficulty of deciding in the case—but a doubt on reasonable grounds then they would give the benefit of it to the accused.

The Jury retired at about 10 minutes past one o'clock.

During their absence the Judge called the attention of Mr. Litchfield to the third count and asked him to show cause why it should not be quashed. The money alleged to be obtained was simply set to accused's account to discharge his indebtedness, and he (His Honour) suggested that was not obtaining money.

Mr. Litchfield could offer no valed objection, and the count was quashed.

His Honour then asked Mr. Litchfield to discuss the point raised by Mr. Terry as to the counts under the Debtors' Act charging accused with contracting a liability for a certain sum in yen. His Honour pointed out that the liability actually was for an indefinite sum of money in sterling, while the indictment said that it was for a certain sum in yen.

Mr. Litchfield suggested various amendments, but the Judge declined to accept them.

The Jury returned into Court at 1.35 p.m.

The Clerk of the Court—Gentlemen of the Jury, have you considered your verdict?

The Foreman (Mr. Martin)—We have.

The Clerk—And do you find the accused guilty or not guilty? On the fourth count first?

The Foreman—Guilty.

The Clerk—That is the verdict of you all.

The Foreman—It is.

The Clerk—On the first, sixth, and seventh counts?

The Foreman—We find him guilty of obtaining money by false pretences.

The Judge—Do you find him guilty of obtaining money, or of attempting to obtain money?

The Foreman—Guilty of obtaining.

The Judge—I am afraid you misunderstood me. I told you he could not be guilty of obtaining money on this count. He could be found guilty not of the offence charged, but of an attempt.

The Foreman—We have certainly misunderstood.

His Honour—Gentlemen, it is this way. It is quite clear that the letter never reached Mr. Bevis in the sense that he personally acted upon it. It is quite clear that you take the meaning to be that the latter was sent to Mr. Bevis with the purpose of getting money, and in that case there was an attempt to obtain money. Under this sixth count if you find him guilty that is the only proper form of your verdict. He did obtain the money, but he did not obtain it through the particular process charged in the indictment. He attempted to obtain it by that process, but the process did not go right through, with the result that as a matter of law we have to say he did not get it in that particular way. You cannot find him guilty of obtaining money on representations to Mr. Bevis unless you find as a matter of fact that they reached Mr. Bevis and were attended to by him.

The Foreman—We discussed that point.

His Honour—And you adhere to it? In order to find him guilty on these counts you must say that the representations went to Mr. Bevis, and I have told you they did not.

Mr. Baldwin—As a matter of law we took it that it was so.

His Honour—You have to take it from me that you cannot find him guilty of obtaining by any construction. The only proper verdict is one of not guilty of obtaining, and guilty of attempting to obtain.

The Foreman—Our opinion was founded on your definition of obtaining money. Our construction of the law was that it was intended for Mr. Bevis as manager of the Bank.

His Honour—Yes, that was the intention, and therefore the moment the letter was sent there was an attempt to get it in that way. But although the money was afterwards obtained it was in law obtained in some other way. The defendant attempted to obtain it by making a mental impression on Mr. Bevis, but in order to find him guilty of obtaining money by that letter you have to find that Mr. Bevis received it and personally acted upon it. And he did not receive it. It is clear from the evidence that he hadn't it at all. You may take it from me that the only proper verdict is not guilty of obtaining, but guilty of attempting to obtain.

The Foreman expressed a desire to retire again.

Mr. Terry—I should like—

His Honour—No, you cannot speak now, Mr. Terry.

Mr. Terry—But, your Honour—

His Honour—No, you cannot speak while the Jury is in the Court.

The Jury then retired.

After their withdrawal Mr. Terry said he should like to ask the Judge to give a proper charge to the Jury. From the remarks that one Juryman made it was evident that they were under the impression that there was some question of legal intendment for them to decide. He thought it would be better if the Judge charged that it was only a question of fact and not of legal intendment that they had to decide.

His Honour—I pointed out that ■ them over and over again.

Mr. Terry—Yes, but still from the remark of Mr. Baldwin it is quite evident you did not get it into Mr. Baldwin's head. I should like your Honour to recall the Jury and tell them there is no intendment of law whatever, but it is a question of fact. I ask this as a proper thing to be done. There is a chance that the prisoner may be prejudiced by the misunderstanding in the minds of the Jury.

His Honour—I will see. I heard the remark of Mr. Baldwin, but I understood it in a different way.

Mr. Litchfield said he would accept a verdict of not guilty in the counts under the Debtors' Act.

The Jury returned after about ten minutes' further consideration and found the accused guilty on the first and sixth counts of attempting to obtain money.

His Honour—I have been asked to say that the matter of the letter to the Bank was left to you as a matter of fact and not as a matter of law. Do you find that is the proper meaning of the addressing of that letter to the Bank—its proper interpretation as a matter of fact is that it was intended to be given to the manager and his staff?

The Foreman—Yes, certainly.

Mr. Litchfield—In the second count I shall ask you to instruct the Jury to return a verdict of not guilty. The third count is quashed, and we ask for a verdict of not guilty in the 5th, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelvth counts.

The verdict was entered accordingly.

The Clerk (to the prisoner)—Charles Emil Leopold, have you anything to say why judgment should not be passed upon you?

Prisoner—No.

His Honour—Charles Emil Leopold, the judgment of this Court is that you be imprisoned for two years with hard labour, and that such imprisonment take place in the Government prison at Hongkong, and that until such time as you are removed there you be imprisoned and kept to hard labour in Her Majesty's Gaol in this place. That is the judgment of the Court on the fourth count. On the first count it is the judgment of this Court that you be imprisoned for one year and that such imprisonment run concurrently with the imprisonment for which you have already received sentence. On the sixth count you are sentenced to one year's imprisonment with hard labour to commence after the termination of the term of imprisonment for which you have been sentenced on the first count, but that shall also run concurrently with the imprisonment to which you have been sentenced on the fourth count. That your imprisonment on the fourth count do commence from the 6th December ended last, being the day on which you first came upon your trial, and that the others shall follow accordingly. The result is, as I hope you will have understood—this is no part of my judgment but to explain the matter to you—that these sentences which have been passed upon you concurrently do not increase the sentence that was first pronounced. The substance of it all is that you are to be imprisoned for two years with hard labour.

The prisoner, who took the matter very quietly, was then removed by the gaoler.

The Judge dismissed the Jury with thanks for the patient attention they had given to the case, and told them that they would be excused from service for a year.

NIPPON RACE CLUB.

The annual meeting of this Club was held at Keil's Building on Friday afternoon. Dr. Wheeler presided, and there were also present:—Messrs. W. B. Walter, T. Thomas, R. D. Robison, V. Blad, M. H. R. Harris, W. W. Till, B. H Pearson, G. Phillip, A. J. Easton, W. F. Mitchell, and K. Kingdon.

THE REPORT.

The Secretary (Mr. J. E. Beale) having read the minutes, Dr. Wheeler presented the report and accounts, which were as follows:—

The Committee have again the pleasure of congratulating the members of the Club on a successful year; the popularity of the N. R. C. continues, as shown by the Honorary Treasurer's account for 1898. Members' subscriptions have increased from Yen 3,160 in 1897 to Yen 3,475. The sum of Yen 2,436.50 has been expended on improvements and repairs in addition to Yen 2,387.50 for the purchase of the plot of ground mentioned in the last report. The Club has been fortunate in receiving no less than six presented prizes, including two from His Imperial Majesty the Emperor, during the year, and your Committee thank the donors for their liberality. In spite of the fact mentioned above, the Club gave Yen 12,600 in prize money against Yen 12,310 during 1897. The year closes with a credit balance of Yen 5,187.46, the balance last year being Yen 4,884.87. Your Committeee have entered into a contract for increasing the present Stand accommodation, the cost of which will be Yen 3,500. The Club now possesses two plots of ground, one measuring 248 tsubo, the other 484 tsubo, both situated on the West side of the grand stand. The title deeds are at present in the name of a Japanese. The Club has also 1,400 tsubo on the North-west boundary of the carriage paddock, on lease for a term of 20 years, and has paid the rent for half this period. The Bureau of Imperial Estates has generously granted the Club free of charge the use of two plots of ground measuring 1,039 tsubo, the eastern portion of the present paddock, on which stalls have been erected. Fourteen China Griffins have been ordered from Shanghai. Country-breds, however, are difficult to obtain on reasonable terms and there is very little chance of supplying willing purchasers with a new batch for the Spring meeting. This will necessitate altering the skeleton programme. The difficulty members of the Club experience in purchasing horses bred in Japan, suitable for racing purposes, threatens to be the most serious the Club has had to encounter for years. The Club was organized with the object of "improving the breed and encouraging the breeding of horses in Japan," but although racing members are willing to pay fair prices for suitable animals, there are none to be had. Hitherto the Government farms have assisted the N. R. C. by supplying young animals at a moderate price, but this channel apparently is no longer to be depended upon. In accordance with Rule 4 the Committee now retire.

Mr. Pearson proposed, and Mr. Robison seconded, that the accounts be taken as read. This was carried.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEE.

The election of the Executive Committee was then proceeded with, the Chairman stating that he believed the retiring members would be willing

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

Mr. TILL suggested that Mr. Mori might be selected to take the place vacated by Mr. R. Rinoiye on the Committee.

The ballot resulted as follows:—Messrs. W. W. Till, Mori, E. Knaff, T. Thomas, V. Blad, A. J. Easton, and J. C. Nicholson.

THE COUNTRY-BRED CLASSES.

Mr. TILL said, with reference to the paragraph in the report with reference to country breds, he had been in hopes that they would be able to obtain a batch of country breds by the assistance of Mr. Mori, but from what he had heard that afternoon he was afraid it would be impossible. They could only get eight ponies, five of which were half-bred and three three-quarter bred, to be delivered in Yokohama for $150. They could get 15 quarter breds, but he thought it was no good trying these.

In reply to a question, Mr. TILL said the Committee had decided to strike out the Maiden races next year, as there appeared to be no chance of filling them. There was nothing for them, and apparently nothing to be had.

Mr. ROBISON thought if the maiden races were left in some people would try to get horses. He proposed that three races be reserved for country bred maidens.

Mr. KINGDON seconded.

Mr. TILL suggested that a proviso should be added "provided the new lot of three years olds do not fill."

It appeared that the feeling of the meeting was against accepting the country breds offered, as several subscribers declined to accept half breds.

Mr. ROBISON therefore withdrew his proposition as a motion, and left it as a suggestion to the Committee.

OTHER MATTERS

Mr. MITCHELL called attention to the very unsatisfactory condition of the road to the Race-course, of which he heard many complaints. He believed the Committee were taking steps in the matter.

Mr. TILL said the Committee were negotiating with the Kencho with the view of making a road. If not successful, they must do it at their own expense. They had not got a reply yet from the Kencho. The Committee were quite unanimous as to the necessity of doing it.

Mr. ROBISON pointed out that there was no entrance for ladies to the stand in case of rain. They had to walk across the grass, which was not pleasant. He suggested an entrance from the paddock to the stand.

It was pointed out that this was impracticable in view of the present traffic arrangements.

The CHAIRMAN suggested that the matter should be left to the incoming committee.

Mr. KINGDON suggested that there should be one race for members' nonwinners at the next meeting. It would encourage members to ride.

The meeting then adjourned, a vote of thanks being passed to the Committee for their services, and to the Vice-President.

THE AMERICAN COLONIES.

The American people have taken the great plunge. They have decided to accept a great and widely divided Colonial Empire, which, under an irresistible though inexplicable historic law, will expand and expand until their destiny is accomplished. Their attitude seems to puzzle the Continent and some strict legists here, but it is not, we think, unintelligible or even obscure. They have already annexed Hawaii, which is in no sense an island of America, and will govern it, we presume, as a Territory, that is, through its people subject to the general control of Congress. They have avowedly annexed Porto Rico, and will, we imagine, after a short interval, make of that a Territory also, though they may for a year or two leave it to be reduced to perfect order by military agents. They have not annexed Cuba for three reasons,—first, because they do not intend to pay her Debt; secondly, because they do not know how far her population will prove loyal; and thirdly, because they do not wish to leave a half-savage mass of half-castes and negroes to govern themselves and the white men. They will wait till the island grows calm, and fills up, as it will do, with Americans and American-Italians; and meanwhile they will remain "in military occupation," will govern the island with a strong hand, and will, of course, remain answerable to the world for its conduct and its destiny. They will have no option about that last matter, and we do not believe they will claim one. A derelict island is impossible. Finally, they have through the President instructed their Peace Commissioners to claim the whole of the Philippine Islands, offering at the same time to pay a sum equal to the local Debt, not as compensation for districts not actually in their possession—that is a grotesque suggestion when the history of colonial conquest is considered—but in payment for certain rights of property, as apart from dominion, possessed by the Spanish Government. As Spain is unable to create a fleet which can defeat the American squadrons, she must perforce submit, and will, we imagine, do so without very keen reluctance. The pride of Spain suffers cruelly; but her statesmen have long been sick of the burdens imposed by the colonies, while her people who valued them, have been disenchanted by the intolerable weight which their defence has added to the burden of conscription. How the islands are to be governed is not as yet decided; but as they contain eight or nine millions of people, they will doubtless be controlled, under one fiction or another, by picked men from West Point, and a Civil Service slowly organised for judicial and fiscal administration. At all events they will be governed from Washington, and the Americans start, therefore, on their new career in full possession of Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, the Ladrones, and the Philippines as dependencies, all of them of one character, that is, islands defensible by sea power only, but difficult to govern because all occupied by dark labouring populations ruled, guided, and to a large extent taxed by dominant white castes.

To govern such possessions so peopled, wisely, with a certain vivifying gentleness, and yet through decrees from above, is very difficult work, as we discovered when we began it, and before an experience marked by many failures had taught us a sound tradition; and the Americans will find that the task will produce many changes, both in their internal organisation and their dominant ideas. They must, for example, as they already admit, greatly strengthen their Navy, and thus modify their relation to all the Powers of Europe, which, with all their enormous armaments, stand in great awe of powerful fighting fleets. They talk already of the British Fleet as a "menace to mankind," and now here is a second, possibly as strong a sea-Power, about to manifest itself and its strength in the business of the world. The Americans will be unable, with their new position, to abstain from "interfering" in European politics, and will probably, with their possessions, be indisposed to abstain. Then they must have a much larger regular Army, for the security which their rule will give to person and property in their colonies will attract large and diversified populations, and to keep them quiet they must have troops which can be used at a moment's notice, without the delays and excitement and lavish expenditure attendant on volunteering. Moreover, half these troops must be dark men, negroes, half-castes, Tagals, and, we should say, Mahommedan Malays, who are amongst the bravest men in the world. The islands, whether in the Caribbean Sea or the Pacific, cannot support, even if they are well governed, the cost of American soldiers by the ten thousand, nor will American opinion lightly regard the necessary expenditure of life on the islands which it will take half a century to render fairly healthy for white men. To make such dark troops into trustworthy auxiliaries they must be governed in a way which Americans have yet to learn, and, above all, be exempted from the first from any insult or any ridicule on the ground of colour. The dark races fear and, in a way, reverence, the white one, but without giving up their own impression that they also are God's creatures, entitled both to self-respect and to personal vanity. Individual American officers have displayed great aptitude for organising dark regiments both at home and in China; but Washington will now have to establish a tradition by the help of which ordinary officers may do this work nearly as well as picked men. And, finally the Americans will have to acquire that wonderful, to us almost inexplicable, English tolerance which alone enable Englishmen to avoid incessant collisions with their millions of dark subjects. They have, by a miracle of good luck, this tolerance already as regard religion, holding as they do a conviction that no man's faith can be the business of the State; but they have to acquire it as regards many moral questions, polygamy for example, many questions of grade, as dark race being at heart democratic, and some few fiscal questions of high importance, the aversion of dark men, for example, to any new kind of direct taxation. The most completely popular rebellion we ever had to face in India was caused by a rate which all Englishmen and Americans pay without a murmur. That our kinsfolk will learn all these lessons in time we have no doubt, but the learning will be slow, and will be attended at first with failures which will tax their splendid patience, and the resourcefulness and openness of mind which they have hitherto displayed in every department of life except the political. Then trouble will be to believe that schemes for securing social order which work admirably in Massachusetts will hardly work in Cuba and Hawaii, and will produce nothing but wild disorder in Luzon and Mindanao.

We wonder greatly if the American Colonial Dominion will pay its own expenses. It should, for most of it is fertile, and some of it, Porto Rico and Luzon, for example, extraordinarily productive. Nevertheless, we are not quite sure. The Spanish soldier costs little beyond his keep, while the American soldier is a more expensive article even than our own. A tropical Civil Service, again, to be pure, and to be composed of picked men, must be highly paid, and must be provided with pensions, which become in time a serious burden on the Treasury. A colony, too, which is a mass of islands like the Philippines, demands a good many officials, for every island not provided with them sinks rapidly into anarchy. And lastly, the colonies are in want of public works, railways, roads, harbours, healthy barracks, quays, and lighthouses, and the amount which can be spent on those "necessities of civilisation" is almost limitless. The colonies may cost a good deal of money for some years, and though the Union can pay anything, we are not quite sure of its willingness to export treasure. We also can pay anything if we try, but we are very unwilling to pay either for India or the Colonies. The Americans have not shown themselves very willing to accept debts, and were obviously relieved when General Merritt reported that there was for the present money enough in Manila to pay everybody. The taxation of the islands will have to be made searching, and to include direct as well as indirect imposts; and we should not be surprised to find that the first ground of quarrel between the islanders and their new rulers was the weight of the financial burden. The natives will grow rich very soon, and be able to pay any reasonable demands; but they do not like taxation, and the only mode of resisting it with which they have hitherto been acquainted is murderous insurrection.—The Spectator.

the figure originally taken seemed excessive, and to that end general standards were given for each division of the empire. Finally, it was proposed that six per cent. be taken as the rate of interest universally: in other words, that the value of land should be considered as 16⅔ years' purchase of the rent obtained for it. In many cases the rate now taken is lower than 6, and, of course, the assessed value of the land in terms of the rent is correspondingly higher.

Several questions were asked with regard to this Bill, and the Government Delegate, Mr. Megata, gave full explanations. A difference of opinion arose as to whether the Bill should be handed to the Special Committee charged with the duty of reporting upon the Land-Tax Amendment Bill, or whether an independent Committee should be appointed. Mr. Hoshi Toru moved that, in view of the importance of the Bill, the members of the various special and standing committees should be summoned from their rooms, in order that the matter might be decided by a full House. That having been done, the President announced that an open ballot would be taken to decide between the two proposals. The result was that 146 voted for handing the Bill to the Special Committee of 27 which was to be nominated for the purpose of reporting on the Land Tax Bill, and 127 voted for a separate committee.

4. A private Bill for amending the Law of the Administrative Court. According to the language as it now stands, the cases falling within the jurisdiction of the Court are set forth specifically (rekki shugi). The consequence is that the Law, owing to excessive minuteness, is defective in comprehensiveness. The Bill proposes to change the specific enumeration for a general enumeration (gaikwatsu-shugi), for, with things as they are at present, many cases fall beyond the jurisdiction of either the common courts or the Administrative Court.

5. A private Bill for amending the Barrister's Law, in the sense of improving the status of Barristers.

6. A private Bill for amending the Business Tax Regulations. The proposed amendments do not extend to the system of taxation but only affect the rates. The latter are lowered throughout in the amendments, and the taxes on rental values of premises (chintai kakaku) and on employés (jugiyo-sha) are abolished. The Bill was handed to the Special Committee entrusted with the duty of reporting upon No. 5.

The House rose at 3.40 p.m.

MONDAY, DEC. 12TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.10 a.m., and passed the Supplementary Budget for presenting 20 million yen from the Indemnity to the Imperial Estates; the Bill for amending the Law relating to Grants in Aid of the Families of deceased Officials, and the Bill for changing the boundaries of Ibaraki and Chiba Prefectures. Baron Funakoshi, formerly Governor of Chiba, delivered a long speech in support of the last measure.

The House rose at 10.55 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.15 p.m.

THE ASHIO MINE QUESTION.

Mr. Nakamura, Vice-Minister of the Army, asked permission to offer an explanation. Mr. Tanaka Shozo, when speaking with reference to a Question about the Ashio Mine, presented by him on the 10th instant, had alleged that military men had trampled the people under the feet of their horses. He desired to declare that such an allegation was absolutely baseless.

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN FORMOSA.

Mr. Takagi Masatoshi presented a question with regard to the expenses of military operations for restoring good order in Formosa. He wanted to know why the appropriations for that purpose were included in the Budget for 1899-1900, instead of being embodied in a supplementary budget for the present year. Japan's reputation was greatly injured by her failure to administer Formosa, and this procrastination in the matter of finance seemed to indicate that the Government took a very light view of its responsibilities. They might indeed reply that repeated failures to bring a new budget into existence had hampered their accounts, but such an excuse could not have any validity, for the fate of the general Budget was independent of the fate of a supplementary budget. If Japan wanted to be regarded as a serious country; in other words, if she desired to establish for herself a character such as would enable her to conduct her foreign relations satisfactorily, the best thing she could do was to correct the incompetence of the military in Formosa and to amend the whole system.

MILITARY SECRETS.

The Bill for the better Preservation of Military Secrets, as sent down from the House of Peers, was then read for the first time. The Government Delegate explained that the laws now in force only provided punishments for violations of trust which had actually been committed and were of no efficiency for preventive purposes. Hence the Bill now before the House.

After a few questions the Bill was handed to a special committee.

MR. TANAKA SHOZO EXPELLED.

At this point Mr. Tanaka Shozo announced a desire to reply to the remarks made by the Vice-Minister of War at the commencement of the sitting.

The President ruled that such a course would not be in order, but Mr. Tanaka angrily disputed the ruling, and severely censured the President. The latter remaining firm, Mr. Tanaka shouted:—"Has the Minister of War told a falsehood or has Tanaka Shozo tried to deceive the people? Which is the more credible?"

The President thereupon ordered Mr. Tanaka to withdraw from the Chamber, and Mr. Tanaka obeyed, calling out in a loud voice as he left the hall, "I desire nothing better."

NEW BILLS.

The Bill, sent down from the Peers, for extending the system of Military Courts Martial to Formosa, was then read and handed to a Special Committee.

Several Government Bills relating to changes in methods of account for the purpose of greater financial convenience, were then read and handed to Special Committees.

The House rose at 2 p.m.

THURSDAY, DEC. 15TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.10 a.m.

PRIMARY EDUCATION.

Mr. Chisaka presented a question with reference to an appropriation from the Indemnity to form a capital fund in aid of primary education. The Houses of the Diet had voted a Representation to the Government in that sense during the ninth session, and petitions had been received from all parts of the country. It might be truly said that the nation's wish was unanimous. But the Government had not taken any step to give practical effect to the views embodied in the Representation, and as the final disposition of the remainder of the Indemnity was now at hand, the signatories of the Question desired to know what view was entertained by the Cabinet.

FORMOSA.

The Order of the Day having been taken, a favourable report was presented by the Special Committee on the Government Bill for continuing, until 1905, the operative force of Law No. 63 of 1896, by which legislative competence is vested in the Governor General of Formosa.

Mr. Izawa opposed the Bill. He contended that the administrative methods hitherto adopted in Formosa had been a failure; that the manner of dealing with the insurgents had been faulty; that the pardon recently granted to rebels by the Governor General had been a violation of the Imperial Prerogative, and that the House might reasonably expect the substitution of some new and improved system for the old and defective one.

Mr. Mizuno, while not denying the force of the criticisms which the administration of Formosa evoked, saw no reason to reject this Bill.

Dr. Goto, Chief of the Civil Bureau in Formosa, offered some explanations, and the House passed the First Reading, but decided not to proceed with the Second Reading at once.

THE GIFT TO THE THRONE ACCEPTED

The President announced that he had been summoned to the Palace that morning, and had received the following message for transmission to the House:—

> With reference to the transfer of a portion of the Indemnity to the Imperial Estates, We approve the reverence and sincerity of the House of Peers.

NEW BILLS.

The Government Bill for amending the Law relating to free grants of land in Hokkaido, having been recommended by the Special Committee for approval, was passed through all its Readings.

A Government Bill embodying a project of Nationalization Law, similar to that introduced in the last session of the Diet but not passed owing to time, was then introduced briefly by Professor Hozumi, Government Delegate, and handed to a Special Committee, as was also a Government Bill relating to an amendment of the Peers Law.

The House rose at 11.35 a.m.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.15 p.m.

THE GIFT TO THE THRONE.

The Vice-President—Mr. Motoda Hajime—read an Imperial Message couched in the same terms as that delivered to the House of Peers in the forenoon.

A HEATED DEBATE.

Mr. Kudo Kokan presented a Question with reference to the dispersal of the Anti-Land-Tax Union Meeting at the Maple Club that morning. He said that, just as Viscount Tani was about to deliver an address, the Shiba Police Inspector had ordered the meeting to dissolve on the ground that its proceedings were inimical to public order. How was such an extraordinary act to be explained? The present condition of the national finance demanded the closest consideration and the fullest discussion by all parties in the State. Count Okuma and many other distinguished persons had attended the meeting for the purpose of debating on the soundest economical measures to be taken at this juncture. In what respect was such a meeting inimical to public order? And how did it happen that precisely similar meetings held in the Imperial Hotel for the purpose of hearing Marquis Ito's financial views, were not ordered to disperse for the same reason? If the action taken that morning by the police was merely a blunder on the part of an Inspector, the matter would assume a comparatively trivial aspect, though the punishment of the Inspector would not altogether absolve the Cabinet employing him. But if he had acted under instructions from the Government, then such a Government was no longer worthy of confidence. Incidents of this nature could not fail to bring discredit upon Japanese civilization in the eyes of foreign nations. All faith in the integrity of the Cabinet would be lost, and innumerable abuses might be expected to spring up from innumerable quarters. He could not for his own part believe that procedure so arbitrary and improper had the sanction of the Ministry, but assuredly it was necessary that the responsibility should be definitely ascertained. If, indeed, the Cabinet had been cognizant of the Police Inspector's action, then he ventured to say that they were under no obligation to be governed by a Ministry which set the constitution at naught.

Mr. Momma Shokei rose to speak, but the Vice-President announced that the Order of the Day must be taken.

speak. He had sought the Vice-President's permission prior to Mr. Kudo's speech, and the Vice-President had desired him to wait.

SCENES OF DISORDER.

The Vice-President ruled Mr. Momma to be out of order, and called upon the chairman of the Special Committee to present his report with reference to the first Bill on the Order of the Day, but Mr. Momma declined to resume his seat and continued to address the House in a loud voice, declaring the Vice-President's ruling improper. Several members cried out that the Vice-President was wrong, and voices were raised from the Peers' Box in the Gallery encouraging Mr. Momma to proceed. The latter grew more excited and defiant, so that the Vice-President finally ordered him to withdraw. He refused to obey the order, and resisted a sergeant who approached to enforce it. Mr. Sato Kyoshi, who sat beside him, assisted to obstruct the sergeant. Four or five sergeants now came up, and several members approached, among them Mr. Nakamura Yaroku, who undertook to demonstrate that when the sergeants were directed to remove a member seated between two others, they must not disturb either of the latter, but must climb over or under the middle of the desk to get at the recalcitrant member. The House gradually fell into a state of confusion, and the Vice-President, unable to re-assert his authority, ordered a recess.

When the House re-assembled 30 minutes later, the Vice-President explained that Mr. Momma had asked permission to make a motion at the beginning of the sitting, but not until after permission had been given to Mr. Kudo Kokan. He (the Vice-President) had therefore desired Mr. Momma to postpone his motion until after Mr. Kudo's speech, whereupon Mr. Momma had withdrawn the motion, thereby renouncing any right which he might otherwise have claimed. Under the circumstances the Order of the Day had been announced immediately on the conclusion of Mr. Kudo's remarks, and after the announcement it was of course out order for any member to address the House on an irrelevant subject. In view of what had occurred, he felt it to be his duty to hand Mr. Momma to the Disciplinary Committee, and to suspend the sitting (2.35 p.m.)

JAPANESE LITERATURE.

By Clay MacCauley.

[Note.—This paper, read in part at a meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society, October 21st last, has as its basis an article compiled by the present writer for the "Warner Library of the World's Best Literature" recently published in New York, U.S.A. This paper, however, differs from the latter in the arrangement of its materials, and especially by the incorporation in it of much further exposition and of quite a number of new illustrative translations of Japanese writings. In putting this larger compilation into permanent form the writer wishes to say that his work should not be considered as being at all commensurate to his theme: it is merely a sketch-composition that may serve to show the general reader who does not have access to the special student's libraries, somewhat of the kinds of literature, distinctively Japanese, that the Japanese have produced in their career as a lettered people. As a rule the writer has accredited at proper places the respective authors with the materials taken from their works, but he wishes here to acknowledge in general much unaccredited help gained from the studies of W. G. Aston, Esq., Prof. B. H. Chamberlain and Sir Ernest Satow.]

Civilization in Japan bears date from a time much more recent than that generally ascribed to it. The uncritical writers who first made Japan known to Western peoples accepted the historical traditions treasured by the Japanese as a record of fact. In the popular imaginings of the West, consequently, Japan is a land which for at least twenty-five centuries an organized society, under a monarchy of unbroken descent, possessed of a relatively high though unique culture in the sciences and arts, has had place and development. But, during the last twenty years, competent students have discovered that Japanese civilization is comparatively modern. They cannot carry its authentic history much farther back than about half-way over the course that has been usually allowed for it. No reliance can be placed upon any date or report in Japanese tradition prior to near the opening of the fifth Christian century. Undoubtedly there was, as in all other lands, some basis for long-established tradition; but the glimpses of Japan and its people obtained through the Chinese and Korean annals of the early Christian centuries disclose the inhabitants of these islands, not with an organized State and society, peaceful, prosperous, and learned, but as segregated into clans or tribes practically barbarous and wholly illiterate; the clan occupying the peninsula east of the present cities of Kyōto and Osaka having then become leader and prospective sovereign. Certainly before the third Christian century was well advanced there was no knowledge whatever of letters in Japan; and certainly too, for a long time after the art of writing had been brought into the country there was no popular use or knowledge of the art.

I.
Historical Sketch

The knowledge of letters was in all probability introduced into Japan by Korean immigrants. Their language and writing were Chinese. In the fourth century there may have been among the Japanese some learners of this new knowledge. The Japanese claim positively that in the fifth century their national traditions, hitherto transmitted orally, were written down by adepts in the new art. But whatever may be true of the earlier centuries, it is perfectly clear that in the first half of the sixth century many scholars came to these islands from the continent, and were given positions of trust in the administration of the dominant government in Yamato; and that from the year 552 A.D., with the acceptance of Buddhism by those highest in authority, and the full inflow of Chinese influence upon society, literature in Japan began to have permanent place and power.

But literature in Japan and Japanese literature are two quite different things. They are as unlike as the Latin writings of mediæval Germany and the German writings of later times. Japanese literature, which only is the theme of this paper, does not date from the notable acquisition by the Japanese of a knowledge of letters. Not with that, nor for a long time afterwards, was any serious attempt made among them to express in writing the language of the people. In all probability this was not done until towards the end of the seventh century. The higher officials of State and of the Church—the new Buddhism—had a monopoly of learning; and their writings prior to the eighth century were, so far as is known, wholly Chinese in word and in form. But as the eighth century opened, a medium for the production of a Japanese literature was receiving shape. A kind of script devised from Chinese ideographs for the purpose of expressing Japanese speech was coming into use: that is, Chinese characters were being written for the sake of their phonetic values; their sounds, not their meanings, reproducing Japanese words, and sentences. In this so-called manyō-kana the first material embodied was in all probability that for which verbatim transliteration was necessary, such as ancient prayers and songs. With this phonetic writing a literature distinctively Japanese was made possible, and had its beginnings.

Archaic Writings.

700-900 A.D.

1. Kojiki.—The earliest Japanese literary product now existing, excepting possibly a small fragment of ancient chronicles called the "Kiujiki," is a marvel-bearing summary of treasured tradition, known as the "Kojiki" or "Record of Old Things" written by imperial command and completed in the year 712. The "Kojiki" is a professed history of creation, of the Divine genesis of the imperial family of Japan, and of the career of this "people of the gods" into the early part of the century preceding its composition. To the student of Japanese literature the "Kojiki" is especially valuable, because in it are preserved the oldest known products of the purely literary impulses of the Japanese. Long before the Japanese could write, they could sing; and there is good reason to accept the songs given in the "Kojiki" at heritages from the much farther past.

Why Universal Darkness Once Reigned.

[From the "Kojiki," compiled in 711-12 by Yasumaro, a high official of the Imperial Court. The "Kojiki" (Record of Ancient Matters) is the sacred book of Shintōism, and thus practically the Bible of Japan. The whole work has been translated into English by Basil Hall Chamberlain.]

As the Great and Grand Goddess Amaterasu [Sun goddess] sat in her sacred work-room, seeing to the weaving of the Grand Garments of the Gods, her brother Haya-Susano-o made a hole in the roof, and dropped down through it a Heavenly Piebald Horse which he had flayed backwards; at whose aspect the maidens weaving the Heavenly Garments were so much alarmed that they died. . . . At this sight was the Great and Grand Goddess Amaterasu so much terrified that, closing behind her the door of the Rocky Abode of Heaven, she made it fast and disappeared. Then was the whole High Plain of Heaven darkened, and darkened was the Middle Land of Reed-Plains [i.e. Japan], in such wise that perpetual night prevailed. And the clamour of the myriad evil spirits was like unto the buzzing of flies in the fifth moon, and all manner of calamities did everywhere arise. Therefore did the eight myriad Gods assemble in a Divine Assembly on the banks of the river Amenoyasu, and bid the God Omoikane devise a plan. And Her Grandeur Ame-no-Uzume, binding up her sleeve with the Heavenly Moss from Mount Ame-no-Kagu, and braiding the Heavenly Masaki in her hair, and bearing in her hands the leaves of the bamboo grass from Mount Ame-no-Kagu, did set a platform before the door of the Heavenly Abode, and stamp on it until it resounded. Then did the High Plain of of Heaven tremble, and the eight myriad Gods did laugh in chorus. Then the Great and Grand Goddess Amaterasu was filled with amazement, and setting ajar the door of the Rocky Abode of Heaven, spake thus from the inside: "Methought that my retirement would darken the Plain of Heaven, and that darkened would be the whole Middle Land of Reed-Plains. How then cometh it to pass that Ame-no-Uzume thus frolics, and that all the eight myriad Gods do laugh?" To which Ame-no-Uzume replied: "If we laugh and rejoice, 'tis because there is here a Goddess more illustrious than thou" And as she spake, their Grandeurs Ame-no-Koyane and Futotama brought out the mirror, and respectively showed the same to the Great and Grand Goddess Amaterasu, who, ever more and more amazed, gradually came forth from the door to gaze upon it; whereupon the God Ame-no-Tajikarao, who had been lying in ambush, took her by the hand and drew her out. . . . And so when the Great and Grand Goddess Amaterasu had come forth, light was restored both to the High Plain of Heaven and to the Middle Land of Reed-Plains.

AN ANCIENT LOVE SONG.

[This song, paraphrased, by the present writer from the literal translation of it by Prof. Chamberlain given in the "Kojiki," is one of the very oldest of extant Japanese versifications. An attempt has been here made to render into English the peculiar alternating five and seven syllable metre of Japanese verse].

The Deity-of-Eight-Thousand-Spears went forth to woo the Princess of Nuna-kawa in the land of Koshi and sang a song before her house. Then the Princess of Nuna-kawa, without yet opening the door, sang from the inside, saying:—

Yachi hoko no
Kami no mikoto
Nuye kusa no
Me ni shi areba
Waga kokoro
Urasu no tori so
Ima koso wa
Chidori ni arame
Nochi wa
Nadori ni aramu wo
Inochi wa
Na shite tamai so.

Of Eight Thousand Spears
Thou the August Deity!
Like a drooping plant
I, a tender maiden, am:
And my fluttering heart
Like to bird upon the strand;—
Like the sanderling,
Timid bird that, startled, flees.
But the hour will come
When compliant it will be.
So, upon thy life,
Do not deign to yield to death.

2. NIHONGI—Within nine years after the appearance of the "Kojiki" another compilation of national tradition was made, bringing the story of the nation down to the close of the seventh century. This work (year 720) is called "Nihongi" or Japanese Chronicles. But it is almost wholly Chinese in language and in construction. Its special value, considered as part of Japanese literature, lies in its preservation of some old Japanese verse.

Illustrative Translations.

WHY THE SUN AND THE MOON DO NOT SHINE TOGETHER.

[From the "Nihongi" (Chronicles of Japan): a rendering and amplification, for the chief part in Chinese, of the "Kojiki," completed under the direction of Prince Toneri and Ono Yasumaro in 720. The "Nihongi" is the popular embodiment of ancient tradition. The following extract is taken from the translation of the whole work made by W. G. Aston, Esq.]

Now when Ama-terasu no Oho-kami (Sun Goddess) was already in Heaven, she said:—"I hear that in the Central country of reed-plains (Japan) there is the Deity Uke-mochi no Kami (Goddess of Food). Do thou, Tsuki-yomi no Mikoto (Moon God) go and wait upon her." Tsuki-yomi no Mikoto, on receiving this command, descended and went to the place where Uke-mochi no Kami was. Hereupon Uke-mochi no Kami turned her head towards the land, and forthwith from her mouth there came boiled rice: she faced the sea, and again there came from her mouth things broad of fin and things narrow of fin. She faced the mountains and again there came from her mouth things rough of hair and things soft of hair. These things were all prepared and set out on one hundred tables for his entertainment. Then Tsuki-yomi no Mikoto became flushed with anger, and said:—"Filthy! Nasty! That thou should dare to feed me with things disgorged from thy mouth." So he drew his sword and slew her, and then returned and made his report, relating all the circumstances. Upon this Ama-terasu no Oho-kami was exceedingly angry, and said:—"Thou art a wicked Deity. I must not see thee face to face." So they were separated by one day and one night, and dwelt apart.

IN PRAISE OF THE DRAGON FLY.

[This ode, taken from W. G. Aston's translation of the "Nihongi," is ascribed to the Emperor Yūriaku, A.D. 460. But, says Mr. Aston, —"It is not to be supposed that the Emperors actually composed these verses themselves, nor perhaps any others ascribed to them in the 'Nihongi.' The hand of the Court-poet is plain in the honorific epithets and forms given to him therein."]

The Emperor made a progress to Kahakami no Ono, where he commanded the forest wardens to drive the wild beasts. He lay in wait hoping to shoot them himself, when a gad-fly came swiftly flying. Then a dragon-fly flew thither suddenly, bit the gad-fly and went away with it. The Emperor was pleased at its attention and commanded his Minsters, saying:—"Do ye on Our behalf compose an ode in praise of this dragon-fly." As none of the Ministers made so bold as to compose an ode, the Emperor forthwith composed a short piece, saying:—

These tidings some one
Told in the Great Presence,
How in Yamato
On the Peak of Omura
Four-footed game was lying:
The Great Lord,
When he heard this,
Stood at his throne
Entwined with jewels,
Stood at his throne
Entwined with cloth:
Waiting for the game,
Whilst I remained
Waiting for the wild boar;
Whilst I was standing
My arm in the fleshy part,
Was stung by a gad-fly:
But soon a dragon-fly
That gad-fly did bite.
Even a creeping insect
Waits upon the Great Lord.
Thy form it will bear,
O Yamato, land of the dragon fly.
* * * * *
That in this wise
It should be famous
The Heaven-filling
Land of Yamato
Was called the Land of the Dragon fly.

3. NORITO—Among the important remains of the beginnings of Japanese literature are some prayers used in the ritual (norito) of Shintōism. When these ancient expressions of this ethnic religion were first put into written form is not known. Their appearance as literature however, certainly took place as early as the tenth century, and, says, Sir Ernest Satow in an article on the "Norito," it is "likely that the norito as we have received them, had been transmitted orally, without any material alteration, for generations before they came to be written down."

PRAYING FOR HARVEST.

[This norito is ascribed by Mabuchi to the reign of the Emperor Kō-in 770-781. It was celebrated on the 4th day of the 2nd month of the year. Sir Ernest Satow, from whose translation the following extract is taken, remarks that "whether this ritual date from the extremely vague epoch to which Mabuchi ascribes it, there seems sufficient internal evidence that it owes its origin to a very remote period of antiquity."]

He (the Mikado) says:—"I declare in the presence of the sovran Gods of the Harvest. If the sovran gods will bestow in many bundled ears and in luxuriant ears the late-ripening harvest which they will bestow, the late-ripening harvest which will be produced by the dripping of foam from the arms and by drawing the mud together between the opposing thighs, then I will fulfil their praises by setting-up the first fruits in a thousand ears and many hundred ears, raising-high the beer-jars; filling and ranging-in-rows the bellies of the beer-jars, I will present them (i.e. the first fruits) in juice and in ear. As to things which grow in the great-field-plain,—sweet herbs and bitter herbs; as to things which dwell in the blue-sea-plain,—things wide of fin and things narrow of fin, down to the weeds of the offing and weeds of the shore: and as to CLOTHES—with bright cloth, glittering cloth, soft cloth and coarse cloth will I fulfil praises. And having furnished a white horse, a white boar, and a white cock, and the various kinds of things in the presence of the sovran god of the HARVEST. I fulfil his praises by setting up the OFFERINGS of the sovran GRAND-CHILD'S augustness" (i.e. Amaterasu, the Sun-goddess).

4. MANYOSHIU.—The chief depository, however, of Japanese literature in its beginnings is the treasury of poems gathered during the Nara Era (completed about 760),—the "Manyōshū" or "Collection of Myriad Leaves." In these books the choicest utterances in Japanese verse then existing were garnered. They remain now an invaluable memorial of the intellectual awakening that followed Japan's first historic intercourse with Korea and China.

URASHIMA TARO.

[From the "Manyōshū," a collection of ancient verse compiled about 760, by Prince Moroe and the poet Yakamochi. This poem, relating the adventures of "the Japanese Rip Van Winkle," is supposed to be much older than the eighth century. Translation by W. G. Aston.]

When the days of spring were hazy,
I went forth upon the beach of Suminoe;
And as I watched the fishing-boats rock to and fro
I bethought me of the tale of old:
[How] the son of Urashima of Midzunoe,
Proud of his skill in catching the katsuwo and tai,
For seven days not even coming home,
Rowing on beyond the bounds of the ocean,
Where with a daughter of the god of the sea

He chanced to meet as he rowed onwards.
When with mutual endearments their love had been crowned,
They plighted their troths, and went to the immortal land,
Where hand in hand both entered
Into a stately mansion, within the precinct
Of the palace of the god of the sea,
There to remain for everlasting,
Never growing old, nor ever dying.
But this was the speech which was addressed to his spouse
By the foolish man of this world:—
"For a little while I would return home,
And speak to my father and my mother;
To-morrow I will come back."
When he had said so, this was the speech of his spouse;
"If thou art to return again to the immortal land
And live with me as now,
Open not this casket at all."
Much did she impress this on him;
But he, having returned to Suminoe,
Though he looked for his house,
No house could he see;
Though he looked for his native village,
No village could he see.
"This is strange," said he; thereupon this was his thought:
"In the space of three years since I came forth from my home,
Can the house have vanished without even the fence being left?
If I opened this casket and saw the result,
Should my house exist as before?"
Opening a little the jewel-casket,
A white cloud came forth from it
And spread away towards the immortal land.
He ran, he shouted, he waved his sleeves,
He rolled upon the earth, and ground his feet together.
Meanwhile, of a sudden, his vigour decayed and departed:
His body that had been young grew wrinkled;
His hair, too, that had been black grew white;
Also his breath became feebler night by night;
Afterwards, at last his life departed:
And of the son of Urashima of Midzunoe,
The dwelling-place I can see.
In the immortal land
He might have continued to dwell,
But of his own natural disposition:
How foolish was he, this wight!

A MAIDEN'S LAMENT.

[From the Manyōshū written by Lady Sakanōe, 700-750, daughter of a prime minister and wife of the Viceroy of the Island of Shikoku. Her writings are much praised. This poem, together with the five poems following, all from the (Manyōshū), are translations by B. H. Chamberlain—parts of his admirable work the "Classical Poetry of the Japanese."]

Full o't he sware with accents true and tender,
"Though years roll by, my love shall ne'er wax old!"
And so to him my heart I did surrender,
Clear as a mirror of pure burnished gold;
And from that day, unlike the seaweed bending
To every wave raised by the autumn gust,
Firm stood my heart, on him alone depending.
As the bold seaman in his ship doth trust.
Is it some cruel god that hath bereft me?
Or hath some mortal stolen away his heart?
No word, no letter since the day he left me;
Nor more he cometh, ne'er again to part!
In vain I weep, in helpless, hopeless sorrow,
From earliest morn until the close of day;
In vain, till radiant dawn brings back the morrow,
I sigh the weary, weary nights away.
No need to tell how young I am, and slender—
A little maid that in thy palm could lie:
Still for some message comforting and tender
I pace the room in sad expectancy.

HUSBAND AND WIFE

[Author unknown.]

WIFE

While other women's husbands ride
Along the road in proud array,
My husband up the rough hillside
On foot must wend his weary way.
The grievous sight with bitter pain
My bosom fills, and many a tear
Steals down my cheek, and I would fain
Do aught to help my husband dear.
Come! take the mirror and the veil,
My mother's parting gifts to me;
In barter they must sure avail
To buy a horse to carry thee!

HUSBAND

An I should purchase me a horse,
Must not my wife still sadly walk?
No, no! though stony is our course,
We'll trudge along and sweetly talk.

MY CHILDREN

[Written by Yamagami no Okura, governor of the province of Chikuzen,—700-750.]

What use to me the gold and silver hoard?
What use to me the gems most rich and rare?
Brighter by far—ay! bright beyond compare—
The joys my children to my heart afford?

ELEGY

[Written by a poet named Nibi, of whom nothing is known.]

The gulls that twitter on the rush grown shore
When fall the shades of night,
That o'er the waves in loving pairs do soar
When shines the morning light,—
'Tis said e'en these poor birds delight
To nestle each beneath his darling's wing
That, gently fluttering,
Through the dark hours wards off the hoar-frost's might.

Like to the stream that finds
The downward path it never may retrace,
Like to the shapeless winds,
Poor mortals pass away without a trace:
So she I love has left her place,
And in a corner of my widowed couch,
Wrapped in the robe she wove me, I must crouch
Far from her fond embrace.

TO A FRIEND.

[Written by Hitomaro, probably without a peer among Japan's ancient poets. Hitomaro was not of high rank among nobles, though of imperial descent. He became a provincial officer, and died, it is said, in the year 737.]

Japan is not a land where men need pray,
For 'tis itself divine;
Yet do I lift my voice in prayer, and say,
"May every joy be thine!

"And may I too, if thou those joys attain,
Live on to see thee blest!"
Such the fond prayer that, like the restless main,
Will rise within my breast

ODE TO FUJI YAMA.

[The name of the writer of this ode is not known.]

There on the border, where the land of Kai
Doth touch the frontier of Suruga's land,
A beauteous province stretched on either hand,
See Fuji-yama rear his head on high!

The clouds of heaven in reverent wonder pause,
Nor may the birds those giddy heights essay,
Where melt thy snows amid thy fires away,
Or thy fierce fires lie quenched beneath thy snows.

What name might fitly tell, what accents sing,
Thine awful, godlike grandeur? 'Tis thy breast
That holdeth Narusawa's flood at rest,
Thy side whence Fujikawa's waters spring.

Great Fuji-yama, towering to the sky!
A treasure art thou given to mortal man,
A god-protector watching o'er Japan;
On thee forever let me feast mine eye!

CORRESPONDENCE.

JAPONICIZING CHRISTIANITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—I have been much interested in Will Pattillo's paper in opposition to Mr. Takahashi's view of Japonicizing Christianity, as it appeared in the late number of the Japan Mail. It gives me some ideas of religious controversies that are going on between Japanese Christians and Foreign missionaries. Unfortunately I am not acquainted with Mr. Takahashi's view of the Japanisation of Christianity, and therefore I am not in the least qualified to judge of the dispute between the two well-known writers. But while reading Will Pattillo's communication in the Japan Mail, I fancied that he had not spent much time in studying what he wrote. Perhaps he might have had some prejudices which prevented him from penetrating into the fundamental ideas of Oriental religions, and also into the moral habit of the Japanese. Thus he speaks as if the moral idea of Love were strictly a Christian monopoly. But we had, several centuries before Christ, the Golden Rule of Universal Brotherhood inscribed in Dharmapada and also in Lung Yu. I quote a few words from the Dharmapada scripture:—

"Let a man overcome anger by love, let him overcome greediness by liberality, and the liar by truth."

"Hatred does not cease by hatred at any time; hatred ceases by Love."

"If a man does what is good; let him do it again, let him delight in it."

And let me quote some more from Lung Yu:—

"Do not to others that which you do not like others to do to yourself."

"Treat your enemy as if he were even your friend."

Again, in speaking of the spirit of a Samurai, the writer astonishes me by quoting a dramatic expression: Kataki wo utazu ni shinu no ga zannen desu—I regret to die without slaying my enemy. Why does he not quote real Japanese maxims such as—Bushi ni nishin nashi—the Samurai has no double mind; Kannin wa kannin naranu kannin suruga kannin—Magnanimity is magnanimity, to pardon an unpardonable mistake is magnanimity; Shuteki wo miru nao ryobu no gotoku subeshi—Regard your enemy as a good friend?

Finally, by quoting the Rev. Narayen Sheshadri upon four weaknesses of Hindoism, Will Pattillo says that the same indictment might be made against all religions in Japan. But does Christianity give an entirely consistent account of God? Is the doctrine of the Trinity a logically consistent conception? Is the doctrine of creation a consistent view of God's work? There is a perpetual change in the world, but not creation. There is causation, or a circle of causes, but not an ultimate cause. For a final cause as such is a logical impossibility, as it ends in self-contradiction.

Does Christianity give a correct view of sin? The story of original sin is a mere poetical narration. According to the rational interpretation, that which is forsaken by God is said to be sin. But how can we conceive Absolute as exclusive of sin, without committing ourselves to the error of self-contradiction? That Absolute which excludes relative is not true Absolute.

Is the doctrine of atonement a consistent view of the process of salvation? Is it not a relic of the ancient custom of sacrifice? To the rational mind, atonement as such is not in the least a successful process for lifting man from imperfection.

As to the Christian view of the future world, it seems to us a poetical conception. To us Nirvana is supposed to be the world to come, and our rational conception of Nirvana is freedom from all limitations, and to find heaven on this earth is to attain the state of Uyonehan in which the accomplished is said to be an Arhat. To us the process of salvation is intellectual, moral, and religious discipline, and the end of salvation is to find oneself in God. Our conception of God is real Absolute, harmonious, wholly free from all. Therefore if Christianity be so rationalized as to remove all relics of ancient superstitions peculiar to the Occident, I am glad to say that the Christian missionary would be able to find, in a single morning, millions and millions of sympathisers in this country.

Yours obedient servant,

K. NAKAMURA.

Nagoya, Dec. 7th, 1898.

THE LATE MR. HOOPER.

Had Mr. F. H. Hooper lived until the 15th inst. the tale of his years would only have reached 36. He came to Japan some 15 years ago and for about a twelvemonth or so was with the Chartered Bank. On severing his connection with that institution he entered the office of Messrs. Flint, Kilby, & Co., where he remained until the end, a thoroughly trusted and valued servant. The deceased took a great interest in aquatics and used to row till some years ago, when he was warned of a weakness of the heart, and after that became an ardent supporter of the Mosquito Yacht Club. Before leaving England, Mr. Hooper was a Naval Volunteer. Only a fortnight ago he received the news, by telegram, of the death of his aged mother, to whom he was deeply attached. Amongst his immediate friends his death was not wholly unexpected, as although he was at the office as late as Friday last, the possibility of a suddenly fatal access of his malady could never be lost sight of. Several brothers and sisters reside in England and one brother is a resident of Melbourne, to whom he was contemplating a visit to avoid the winter here, for there can be no doubt that the recent cold aggravated his complaint. The funeral took place on Tuesday morning and was the occasion for many displays of respect and esteem.

AN IMPORTANT CASE FOR FOREIGNERS.

The hearing of the charge against a Japanese trader named Nakagawa Ichitaro, living at Oiamachi, 2-chome, Yokohama, who was prosecuted by Messrs. Klingen and Seux, No. 177, Settlement, was recently concluded. The criminal action was rejected, the court holding that the accused had only incurred a debt. It was stated that the accused on the 13th August purchased indigo valued at yen 1,003.79 from the foreign firm, and paid the amount by a cheque on the Mitsui Bank on the 15th of the same month. When the foreign firm presented the cheque it was found that the accused had no cash in the bank to meet it. The firm thereupon brought a charge of fraud against Nakagawa.

OPENING OF THE Y. C. AND A. C. PAVILION.

Fortune has at length smiled upon the Committee of the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Club and allowed the long deferred opening of the new Pavilion to take place. Saturday turned out a glorious day, after the heavy rain of the previous night, and though the ground was heavy for the football players and the track soft in places for the bicyclists, the meeting must be pronounced a success. In the morning only a handful of ladies were present to inspire "the kids" on to victory over "the crocks," but in the afternoon the fairer section of Yokohama society turned out in force, making, with the bunting and decorations on the new building, a very bright and pleasing picture. The decorations, by the way, deserve particular mention. The design of Mr. C. M. Duff, Vice-President of the Club, they were carried out by the ground-man and his eldest son, the floral portions being the work entirely of the latter. Along the whole front, in chrysanthemums, ran the sentiment—"May the pleasures of Sportsmen never know an end." Above this was the monogram of the Club worked in a floral medallion and surrounded by the H. & S. Bank, our great bowler of those days, and also of C. M. Duff, our present great wicket-keeper (cheers). It also recalls the names of R. D. Walker, one of the best all round cricketers of his time, of his brother I. D. Walker, the famous Harrow captain, who passed away only the other day; Lord Harris, and many others well known at home on the tented field. The next epoch was 1884, when the energy of Edgar Abbott (applause) whose portrait you now see on the wall, organized and carried through the amalgamation scheme which has proved such a success. His pavilion lasted down to the present time and the present building, which I think you will all agree with me is worthy of the Club and of Yokohama.—(Cheers). I have always had great faith in the old saying about a sound mind in a sound body, and believing as I do that the cricket-ground has exercised and will continue to exercise a great influence for good on the young men of Yokohama, I think it is deserving of the hearty support of all the heads of houses in the place (loud applause)—and also of everyone who takes an interest in the welfare of the community.—(Applause). With these remarks, gentlemen, I again declare the New Pavilion opened, and ask you to drink great and continued prosperity to the Y. C. & A. C.—(Loud and long continued applause).

Mr. N. P. KINGDON, who humourously described himself as the youngest member of the Club, remarked that the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Club had always been fortunate in having good men at their head and he hoped they would always have such a good man as their President (Cheers).

Mr. D. BLAKE next rose and said he had great pleasure in presenting to their President, Mr. Mollison, a very slight token of their esteem and appreciation of the manner in which he had conducted the affairs of the Club during the present year. He would say that during the erection of this building Mr. Mollison had taken the deepest interest in all its affairs and had assumed upon himself a great amount of work which he (the speaker) feared others in his position would have failed to undertake (applause). Though there were only a few members of the Committee they thought it better to present this slight token on behalf of the Committee, rather than get up a subscription among the members. He had great pleasure in presenting a small medal to Mr. Mollison and in asking the company to drink with him to their worthy President (loud cheers).

The toast was heartily drunk and all present joined in singing "He's a jolly goood fellow."

Mr. Mollison thanked Mr. Blake and the other members of the Committee most heartily for the very unexpected token of their friendship and good will. He had certainly taken a great interest in the Cricket Club and should continue to do so, so long as he lived, and as he had been more than 30 years in Yokohama it looked as if he should live and die in the place. He saw around him many with whom he had joined in the sports of the old days, not the least being Mr. Kingdon, for whom he rode the famous pony Montezuma in the sixties. Dr. Wheeler was a keen sportsman in those days, and Mr. Dodds also a few years later, while still later he could remember Mr. Kilby making his mark on the rifle range at 600 yards. While he was glad to see the old people about and to recall what they had done, he was also glad to see that the youngsters had made their mark that day. He concluding by thanking them most heartily (cheers).

Mr. F. E. White proposed the toast of their worthy Vice-President (Mr. Duff) saying that he had spent much time over the pavilion and was responsible for the beautiful decorations in that room (cheers.)

The toast was drunk with musical honours.

Mr. Duff said he could assure them it had been a very great pleasure to him to do anything for the Club, but there were many others equally willing to do so, and it was by their help that he had been able to assist the Club. As the younger members were now coming up he hoped they would show the same enthusiasm in the coming season as they had shown in the present one, and he was sure if they would do so the Club would be a great success in every way. (Cheers).

The speech-making, which had been commendably brief, being at an end, the company went downstairs, giving place to the ladies, to view

THE FOOTBALL MATCH.

The football match began shortly before eleven o'clock in the presence of but few spectators. The teams were:—

UNDER 21.

GOAL.

E. Powys.

BACKS.

A. Kingdon, W. McGerrow.

HALF-BACKS.

D. Weed, E. Fladgeley, J. E. Moss (Capt.)

FORWARDS.

J. F. Drummond, W. J. White, H. Kilby, K. van R. Smith, E. Kilby

OVER 21.

GOAL.

F. E. White.

BACKS.

F. J. Lias, G. Allcock.

HALFBACKS.

W. Goddard, E. Barnard, T. S. Forrest.

FORWARDS.

B. Hyde Pearson, H. R. Mair, H. Bethell, H. S. Goddard, W. Mason

Mr. E. Flint Kilby and Mr. E. B. Clarke officiated as linesmen and Mr. F. Gillett as umpire. The juveniles were the first to score, the ball going in off Lias and badly missed by White. Five minutes later Mair equalised. Play was very even, but the youngsters showed much the better combination, their extreme lightness being most against them. During the second half they made innumerable shots at goal, but the wind carried the leather over the bar time and again. Luck was with them in the end and they managed to score two more points—though a smarter goal-keeper could have saved the position in the second case. The older men knocked up another goal before the whistle blew, and the game thus ended in a victory for the lads; a well-earned victory too. The goals have to be credited to Drummond (2), and Smith for the youngsters; and Mair and Pearson for "the crocks."

THE TIFFIN.

Some forty members accompanied the President upstairs to tiffin. Mr. Mollison was supported by Dr. Wheeler, Mr. N. P Kingdon, Mr. James Dodds, Mr. E. Flint Kilby, Mr. J. L. O. Eyton, and others; Mr. F. E. White presided at the over-flow table. A capital spread was prepared by Mr. W. N. Wright, of Wright's Hotel, and at the conclusion of the repast, Mr. Mollison rose and said:—

GENTLEMEN,—It is now my pleasing duty to formally declare the new pavilion opened and in handing their trust over to the members I may be permitted on behalf of the committee to express the hope that the building may be found satisfactory in every way and prove a lasting monument (I use the word advisedly) to the growing importance and popularity of the Y.C. & A.C. —(applause). This is only the third cricket pavilion I have helped to open, but as many of you know my experience goes back to the days of no pavilion, when a small band of enthusiastic cricketers, myself amongst them, used to carry their cricketing materials to and from a small green patch in the middle of what was known as the New Swamp, a few hundred yards from where we are now in the direction of the Creek. That was in 1868. In 1870, however, after moving to our present position, but with a much smaller ground, we were able to indulge in a matched for a pavilion, though still carrying our gear to and from the Settlement, and it was not until a few years later that we rose to the dignity of a real pavilion, single storied; but notwithstanding that it answered the purpose for many years, and there we had many good games in the days of the 10th Regt. It was situated on the west side of the ground and is associated in my memory with the advent of W. B. Thomson,

A. M. Watt. The programme showed a goodly array of entries, but in most events only two started, thus robbing the events of much of their expected interest. The prizes, all presented, were a handsome lot, and were set out on view in the Pavilion during the afternoon. Details:—

ONE MILE NON-WINNERS.

First prize presented by the Captain of the Nippon Bicycle Club; the second by Mr. G. W. Rogers.

E. Powys, jun.... 1
A. Kingdon 2
L. W. Eyton 3

Powys had an easy win. Time, 2 m. 43½ secs.

ONE MILE SCRATCH RACE.

For members of the Tokyo Bicycle Clubs, winners at the late Meeting at Shinobadzu excluded. First Prize presented by Mr. B. Guggenheim, second Mr. T. M. Laffin.

J. Strasser 1
S. Onodera 2
Sugino Shuji 3

Strasser had the race in his hands all the time: a good struggle ensued for second place. Time, 2m. 45 secs.

ONE MILE CHAMPION.

First prize presented by the Sorin Club; second by Mr. R. Ward.

J. M. Scott 1
H. Y. Irwine 2

Irwine was thrown off at the start, and Scott, in a most sportsmanlike fashion, acceded to the race being started afresh. Scott waited on Irwine until the last lap and then came away, winning with ease. Time, 2m. 37¾ secs.

TWO MILE HANDICAP.

(For the Members of the Nippon Bicycle Club.) First Prize presented by Messrs. H. McArthur & Co. Second Mr. C. Glahn.

E. Powys, jun, 175 yards 1
J. M. P. Calliçe, scratch 2

Calliçe caught up Powys and passed him, but in the last lap Powys drew ahead and won as he liked. Time 5m. 53 secs.

SLOW RACE—(50 yards 1 foot track.)

Kobayashi 1
H. Y. Irwine 2

The race was run in two heats, S. Kobayashi winning the first heat and H. Y. Irwine the second. Kobayashi won the final.

CHINAMAN'S RACE.—(Two miles Handicap.)

Prizes presented by the Chinese Community.

Cock Eye, scratch 1
C. Su Kong, 100 yards... 0

Only Cock Eye and C. Su Kong started. This was another "slow race," the pace being very lazy. Cock Eye quickly worked his way ahead, and, though he was passed momentarily on the last lap but one, he went away again, and in the last lap had to go slow to enable his rival to make any show at all. Time, 7 min. 4 sec.

FIVE MILE CHAMPION RACE.

First prize presented by Mr. F. S. James; second prize, Columbia Medal presented by Mr. E. H. Tuska.

J. M. Scott 1
H. Y. Irwine 2
A. Kaneko 0

Kaneko was leading as they passed the pavilion the first time, closely followed by Irwine, who in the next lap drew ahead, and Scott also passed Kaneko, who in the third lap had dropped completely out of the running. From this point the race was simply between Irwine and Scott. For almost the whole of the distance Scott hung on to Irwine's wheel, and just on rounding the eastern corner came away, and won by ten yards. It was a very game race. Time, 13 54½. The time was good considering the heavy state of the track.

WEIGHT AND AGE RACE.—(Mile Handicap).

(For riders over 40 years if weighing 200 lbs., or 50 years if weighing less than 200). First prize presented by Mr. A. H. Dare, second prize presented Mr. "Anheuser."

Pat Peacock, Scratch 1
R. Ward, Scratch 2
H. B. Haskell, 75 yards 3

Haskell dropped out at the beginning of the second lap. Ward was then leading, with Peacock close up. In the last lap Peacock went ahead, and won with great ease. The race excited huge interest, and the winner was most enthusiastically cheered. Time, 3 min. 24 secs.

EGG AND SPOON RACE, ONE LAP.—(in fancy costume).

First Prize for winner presented by Mr. Z. Iseya; second prize, for best costume, presented by Mr. P. Peacock.

This might be called the "tortoise and hair" race, for four of the runners were got up in Japanese costumes with fearful and wonderful topknots (in full rouin costume in fact), while the fifth was a real picture of "old Brer Tarrypin." The tortoise did not get the same luck as in Æsop's time, for Powys won the race, riding the lap with egg and spoon intact, and took first prize. Collaco (the tortoise) took the prize for the best costume.

LAP RACE, FIVE LAPS, Two spurting lines per lap. Prize presented by Mr. Andreis.

J. M. Scott 1
J. Strasser 2
Sugino Shuji 0

Scott led all the way, and won by a third of a lap. Strasser was second all the way. Irwine fell out in the first lap, coming to grief over his machine.

At the conclusion of the sports, the winners assembled in the upper room of the Pavilion, where Mrs. J. P. Mollison awaited them. Mr. J. L. O. Eyton introduced the various successful riders and Mrs. Mollison addressed a few appropriate remarks to each as he received his prize. Mr. Eyton then thanked her and asked her acceptance of a lovely bouquet. Mrs. Mollison then said:—"Before separating I would just like to say how pleased I am to be able to assist, in however small a way, on such an occasion as the opening of this new Pavilion. I know the Cricket Ground has been a pet hobby of my husband's ever since I came to Japan, 18 years ago, and although he has spent a great deal of time over the Pavilion I think, judging by the result, it has been time well spent and I feel proud of his work; also that he should have had an efficient and willing assistant in my brother Charlie, Mr. Duff. I think the members have every reason to be proud of their new Pavilion, and that it does credit alike to the Club and to Yokohama. I am sure all the ladies present will join me in wishing everlasting prosperity to the Yokohama Cricket and Athletic Clubs nor must we forget to thank Mr. Eyton and the Members of the Nippon Bicycle Club for the delightful afternoon's amusement they have given us.

Cheers, including the inevitable "tigers," were then given for Mrs. Mollison, for the President of the Club, and for Mr. Duff—thus bringing a most successful and happy day to an end.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Queen has conferred a distinguished mark of honour on the widow of Capt. Findlay, of the 79th Highlanders, who was killed at the Battle of Atbara. A son has just been born, and the Queen's attention having been called to the fact, Her Majesty has expressed a wish to stand as its godmother, and that the child should be called Victor Alexander. Her Majesty has also presented the child with a christening cloak.

From the reporters' point of view, says the Globe, there has hardly ever been a more difficult case to deal with than the Hooley bankruptcy proceedings. The debtor speaks in so low a tone, despite the repeated protests of Bench and Bar, blurts out the names of important individuals with such peculiar pronunciation, that it is almost inevitable that mistakes should occur.

Five members of the London Scottish Rifle Volunteers now grace Kobe by their presence. These gentlemen, along with Mr. Gordon Brown, a frequent visitor to the port, dined together at the Beach House, Tarumi, last Saturday and had an enjoyable time. They were Mr. A. C. Sim (1863-66), Mr. R. Home Cook (1868-72) Mr. A. Gordon Brown (1877-83), Mr. G. Bruce Webster (1878-83), Mr. A. W. Crombie (1893-94), Mr. W. G. Peter (1895-6).

Surgeon-Captain Jameson tells an interesting story of Colonel Slogget's recovery from a very severe wound received in the battle of Omdurman. He was shot through the lungs, and his name actually appeared in the casualty list among the dead. However, a more careful examination was made, and the Medical Staff discovered that life was not really extinct. Immediately the wound was treated by Lord Lister's antiseptic method, with the result that it healed in three days, and in a month Colonel Slogget had entirely recovered.

CHINESE NEWS.

The Universal Gazette says that the British professor of the Military School in Wuchang has resigned his post to leave for England, and it is reported that a Japanese instructor will be engaged in his stead.

The Peking and Tientsin Times announces that Mr. Pritchard Morgan, M.P., has succeeded in obtaining a concession of all the mineral rights in the province of Szechuan, the largest and probably the richest province of China. If this be true, what are we to think of the recent telegrams announcing that France had demanded these very privileges in Szechuan?

According to a Tientsin dispatch published in a Shanghai contemporary, Li Hung-chang took away with him sixteen students for service on the Yellow River Commission. They were selected partly from the Engineer Cadet Corps of the Tientsin Military Academy and partly from the engineering school attached to the Kaiping Colliery at Tongshan. This corps will be set to work at surveying and drawing maps of the whole course of the Yellow River, in the provinces of Honan and Shantung, for presentation hereafter to the Empress Dowager. General Tcheng Ki-tong, of Shanghai, who was to have had charge of the administration of the new Chinese Bund, has also joined the ex-Viceroy's staff, as well as several foreigners.

News comes from Peking that four more eunuchs of the Palace suspected of belonging to the "Emperor's clique," as opposed to the Empress Dowager's, were arrested by the latter's command and, after having been tortured before the Chief Eunuch's Court, were, on the 20th ultimo, handed over to the Board of Punishments to be exiled to Kashgaria "after the Empress Dowager's birthday festivities." This sentence of banishment, says the N. C. Daily News, may be taken as an act of exceeding leniency on the part of the Empress Dowager whose practice has been generally to order delinquent eunuchs to be beaten to death whenever handed over to the tender mercies of the Chief Eunuch's Court.

According to a Chungking dispatch, the invitation of the Szechuan Petroleum and Mining Exploitation Co. of that city to the coal and charcoal guilds to meet the former to consult as to the future operations of the Company, as already noted by the North China Daily News, raised quite a storm among the ranks of the guild people, who offered a determined opposition to the Company on the ground that it will ruin the present organisations by putting coal on the market at ridiculously low prices. Threats were freely made the other day to bring into Chungking a few thousand miners and charcoal burners to interview the Company's Board of Managers who, by the way, consist of wealthy Szechuan notables, viz: a Hanlin named Sung and two others of Taotai rank. This rather alarmed the latter and a proclamation was accordingly issued by them to the effect that "their future work was only to develop such mines as had already been abandoned in the province or such unopened ones as had been discovered by their employés; and that none that were being worked by private individuals or companies would be touched or interfered with." This, however does not seem to have pacified the guild men who are alleged to have declared that "as the Empress Dowager is in power now, all foreign-modelled institutions must be tabooed and the Central Government would only be too pleased to hear of the destruction of the 'Foreign Company.'" This is a warning to foreign companies of all kinds in Szechuan.

The scene of the murder of the Rev. M. Fleming, of the China Inland Mission, was outside a village called Tsungnanchang, forty li from Panghai, on the road to Kueiyangfu. He had just relieved Mr. Bolton, of the same mission, who was sick, and was starting on a preaching tour when he heard that a Chinese village had been burned by robbers, which proved to be quite correct. Up to this time he had noticed no hostility towards himself. On the 28th of October a Chingping official named Liu arrived and a few days later told one of the tsai (yamên runners) to tell Mr. Fleming he wished to see him. This the tsai neglected to do, sending another man, without the official's cards, in his place. Mr. Fleming, thinking an official would not send a man without his card, did not go. Liu almost immediately left Panghai. On the 1st of November, a military official, also named Liu, arrived in Panghai with a number of soldiers who surrounded the mission, and broke the signboards and some flower pots. A tsungyeh with several soldiers then went to the house, banged at the door and demanded admittance on the pretence that Mr. Fleming had some firearms secreted there for which he wished to search. To this Mr. Fleming naturally objected; but upon being urged by Mr. Pan, the schoolmaster, he opened the door and let them in. The search was made without success and the intruders went away. Fearing for the safety of his own and his two native companions life, Mr. Fleming determined to leave Panghai. This they did on Nov. 4th, intending to reach Kueiyang. They started in good time and reached Tsungnanchang about 12 o'clock, where they rested an hour and had lunch. Starting again they struck the main road to Kueiyang but had no sooner got out of the village than they noticed they were followed by a number of men, the foremost being armed with a big cavalry sword. They had hardly gone half a li when the man with the sword attacked the evangelist, killing him almost instantly. Mr. Fleming, who was riding on a mule, at once dismounted and went to his assistance, but the murderer turned on him, calling at the same time on his companions, who rushed on with cries of "Kill," slashing fiercely at him with their knives. Mr. Fleming closed with his assailant and this was the last that Mr. Pan saw of him for he (Pan) ran for his life and managed to escape, arriving in Kueiyang on the 11th of November.

THE CHRIST CHURCH MEETING.

PRESENT CHURCH LOT TO BE DISPOSED OF.

A meeting of seatholders in Christ Church, Yokohama, was held on Thursday afternoon, to vote upon a proposition to the following effect:—

"That the present Church Lots be sold and replaced by a suitable site on the Bluff, if by so doing a clear gain of yen 10,000, can be secured towards the cost of building a new Church and Parsonage.

"If Buildings suitable for a Parsonage exist on any Bluff Lot acquired the value of such Buildings to be calculated in the yen 10,000, above referred to."

There were present, Messrs. Jas. Walter (in the Chair), W. W Till, R. D Robison, E. Rogers, E. J. Moss, C. G. Wilson, the Rev. E. C. Irwine, Dr. T. H. Triplet, Messrs. E. Whitall, A. J. Gaffe, G. Syme Thomson, E. Flint Kilby, Tom Thomas, W. Rose, W. K. Wilson, E Nicholson, C. H. Pearson, W. B. Walter, Jas. Martin, the Rev. W. T. Austin, Messrs. J. Dudds, F. S. James, E. A. Leather, H. J. Healing, J. R. Parsons, N. P. Kingdon, C. V. Sale, N. F. Smith, J. D. Hutchison, W. F. Mitchell, H. M. Arnould, A. Woolley, J. G. H. Schurr, K. Wilson, H. J. Sharp, and G. W. Rogers.

The meeting, which was perhaps the most representative held in Yokohama for a long time past, was called to order about 4.15 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN described the object that had called the meeting together, the reasons for calling it, etc. He then quoted from a circular that had been issued to the seatholders:—

The following is the Clause in the Trust Deed relating to the power of Seatholders to vote—"Any person residing in Yokohama 6 months, and paying yen 20 a year, or whatever is the annual rent for one sitting (before the meeting is called) may vote at a meeting. Vote to be settled by the majority of those present, who can make rules if not inconsistent with the maintenance and support of the Church or Buildings, Chaplain, and celebration of Divine Services."

From the above it will be seen that a series of sittings in the same name only entitles the holder to one vote.

Seatholders must vote in person and not by proxy.

Only the proposition before the meeting could be discussed, all other matter being out of order. The Chairman then described what steps had been taken by the Church Rebuilding Committee and the Church Committee in the matter; and the legal right that the seatholders had to dispose of the property under the trust deed. At the request of several present he read at length the report of Mr. J. Conder, the architect who had reported upon the condition of the present building, and which practically amounted to a condemnation of the structure owing to its age and general decay. It was, in his opinion, within the bounds of possibility that a violent wind or a more severe earthquake than usual might have serious consequences for the building, more particularly the side aisle. The Church Rebuilding Committee, meeting on October 19, also reported that it "was not worth repairing the present building;" and that "the erection of a new church was absolutely necessary."

Before Mr. KILBY was asked to move the proposition, questions were asked as to the amount of money now in the hands of the Church Rebuilding Committee. It was announced that yen 14,300 had been promised (of which about yen 11,000 had been paid in) and interest on this sum brought it up to about yen 15,000.

Mr. E. FLINT KILBY, then rose and said—The objections to the removal of the site appear to be principally on account of doing away with old associations and for the reason that the ground having been consecrated it should not be devoted to secular purposes. Whilst sympathising with those who hold these views, it must be remembered that so far as old associations are concerned these must necessarily be destroyed by the pulling down of the present building, a course which seems inevitable, in view of the unfavourable report on the structure itself. There can be no doubt but that this building is unworthy of the Service to which it is dedicated and that it must be replaced by a more suitable building, both more suitable for the Services of the Church and worthier of the larger interests now represented at this Port as against those at the time it was built. The Church itself is a consecrated building, but it must be pulled down and thereby destroyed, and when by force of circumstances such a course is permissible with the Church, cannot it justly be permitted to dispose of the ground on which it stood? Another reason advanced for retaining the present site is the greater convenience it affords in its proximity to the hatoba and hotels for seafaring men and for visitors. There may be some reason in this, but if the comparatively small percentage of our congregation drawn from these sources is borne in mind and that only a percentage of this percentage would be affected by the change, this reason does not seem worth great consideration and it is entirely a matter of opinion whether the aggregate attendance of visitors would be adversely affected by the change. When the Church was built 36 years ago, there was no Bluff concession and all using the Church lived in the Settlement, but now this is entirely changed. The residential portion of Yokohama has been transferred to the Bluff and the tendency will be more and more in that direction. It is even safe to predict that many residents will go further afield than the present Bluff limits, making a Settlement Church even further from their homes than at present. If these points are so evident with a Church built 36 years ago, do they not apply with great force to a Church to be built now and to last for 50 years or more to come? If the Settlement is chosen for a site for the new Church why we not see it in a few years in the same position as many of our London Churches, quite away from any of the congregation attending its services? If it were a question to-day of the erection of a Church, there is no doubt but that it would be built on the Bluff and that the Settlement as a site would scarcely be considered. The present site is not a quiet one and there is no safeguard but that at some time it might be even noisier than it is if, for instance, the adjacent property were required for manufacturing premises or tea-firing godowns. The great possibility of the transfer of sites leading to a substantial pecuniary advantage is also a good reason for the change. There seems no doubt but that a considerable amount may be secured by this transfer and this added to the yen 15,000 already subscribed, would warrant the rebuilding of the Church to be speedily commenced. On this point further and more definite information can be given by our Chairman. A reference to the list of seatholders would show that about 80 per cent. of those using the Church are Bluff Residents and in the opinion of many the greatest reason of all would be the increased attendance at our services which should ensue. The question of the power of the Trustees to dispose of the present site has been thoroughly gone into. It is found that the lots were purchased from the Japanese Government, that the title deed is on exactly the same terms as other lots in the Settlement and a legal opinion has been given that the Trustees have power of sale with a view to replace the site by one elsewhere. The decision of the matter rests with the seatholders and is one on which there may be some difference of opinion, but is also one on which the minority should be bound by the vote of the majority and all do their utmost to further the interests of the Church, irrespective of the site that may be chosen.

A long discussion ensued, in the course of which it developed that the meeting was in favour of moving the Church to the Bluff if a reasonable profit on the sale or exchange of sites could be made. The sum set down in the proposition, yen 10,000, was deemed much too small; and it was subsequently pointed out that the figure was merely the minimum one. Mr. Till argued that if only 10,000 yen were made, where was the money coming from to build the new church: the profit should be more in the neighbourhood of 45,000 yen when the relative values of Bluff and Settlement property were taken in account.

Mr. ROBISON thought that the proposition should be altered to read "if in opinion of the Church Committee it be deemed desirable to rebuild the Church on another site."

Mr. KILBY said that the onus of disposing of the property should be thrown on the seatholders.

Mr. F. S. JAMES thought the figure yen 10,000 was too small.—(Hear, hear.) It should be 20,000 yen or 25,000 yen.

Mr. TILL—I quite agree with Mr. James.—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. MITCHELL—I second Mr. Kilby's proposition.

Mr. TILL, after some further discussion, moved an amendment that for 10,000 yen, 25,000 yen be substituted. It would strengthen the hands of the Committee.—(Hear, hear.) Mr. F. S. JAMES seconded, but eventually the figure was reduced to yen 20,000.

Mr. W. B. WALTER, in the course of the subsequent discussion, drew attention to the fact that a church on the Bluff would be more exposed to damage by typhoons and earthquakes than would a similar edifice in the Settlement.

After some further talk the Chairman read Mr. Till's amendment as follows:—

"That the present Church Lots be sold and replaced by a suitable site on the Bluff if by so doing a clear gain of Yen 20,000, can be secured towards the cost of building a new Church and Parsonage.

"If Buildings suitable for a Parsonage exist on any Bluff Lot acquired the value of such Buildings to be calculated in the Yen 20,000, above referred to."

Of the 32 seatholders present, 28 voted for the amendment and none against. The amendment thus became the substantive proposition and was declared carried.

Mr. DODDS asked with whom the power of disposing of the property and rebuilding the Church rested.

Mr. KILBY—The Trustees.

The CHAIRMAN ruled that the subject could not be brought before the meeting.

Mr. ROBISON moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman, the Church Committee, and the building Committee, which was carried, and the meeting dispersed.

TELEGRAMS.

THE LOSS OF THE "YAYEYAMA MARU."

(From our own Correspondent.)

Kobe, Dec. 15.

I learn from a passenger who has just arrived here by the N.P. steamer Victoria, that the Yayeyama Maru was entering Moji harbour at full speed at one a.m. on the 13th, when the strong tide rendered her unmanageable and she was swept right across the Brindisi's stem, carrying away one anchor. Both vessels began drifting and the Brindisi slipped her anchor, hoping to get clear. But both steamers were carried down the harbour on to the Toyo Maru, where the Yayeyama sank at five o'clock. The Brindisi grappled the Toyo Maru, whose anchors luckily held.

The Yayeyama is lying in 27 feet of water, and the bridge is visible. No lives were lost.

The night before last the Glenturret was carried down on to a Blue-funnel boat and some plates were damaged.

EFFECT OF BRITISH AMBASSADOR'S SPEECH.

London, Dec. 9.

Sir Edmund Monson's speech at the Chamber of Commerce banquet is deeply resented in France, it being considered a violation of diplomatic usage.

The Times believes that the French are stubbornly refusing to admit the claims of Egypt and Britain to the Nile basin, hence Sir E. Monson's warning.

OPENING OF THE REICHSTAG.

The Emperor William, in opening the Reichstag, announced forthcoming Bills providing for an increase in the army, and preventing the terrorizing of workmen willing to work.

ANTI-ENGLISH SPIRIT OF FRENCH PRESS.

The French papers are delighted at the absence from Emperor William's and President McKinley's speeches of any reference to special ententes with Britain.

SIRDAR RETURNS TO EGYPT.

Lord Kitchener has started for Egypt.

PEACE CONFERENCE TERMINATED.

London, Dec. 10.

The Paris Commission has terminated and the Hispano-American treaty has been drafted, six months being allowed for ratification. The President of the Spanish Commissioners read a protest declaring that Spain has been obliged to yield to brute force.

THE DREYFUS CASE.

The Court of Cassation has ordered the postponement of the Court-martial against Col. Picquart.

The Dreyfusite papers are now asserting that the late Colonel Henry was the real traitor and Major Esterhazy his accomplice.

CHAMBERLAIN ON BRITISH RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA AND FRANCE.

Speaking at Wakefield, Mr. Chamberlain said that the future regarding France was still unsettled. Referring to the situation in China he believed that an agreement with Russia was desirable, even necessary, if very serious complications were to be avoided.

London, December 14.

Strong rumours are current that Dreyfus will shortly be brought to Paris. During an uproarious sitting of the Chamber, the Socialist Gouset accused the general staff of indiscretion, and fisticuffs ensued between several Dreyfusites and Anti-Dreyfusites.

SPANISH-AMERICAN PEACE TREATY SIGNED.

London, Dec. 12.

The peace treaty between America and Spain was signed at Paris on the 10th. The Times' Washington correspondent states that President McKinley favours selling the Philippines after their cession, but retaining Luzon as a coaling station.

CAPE'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE BRITISH NAVY.

A telegram from Cape Town says that the proposal for a contribution to the British Navy has passed both Houses of the Cape Parliament.

DEATH OF AN EMINENT NOVELIST.

The death is announced of the popular novelist William Black.

PHILIPPINES NOT TO BE SOLD.

London, Dec. 13.

The Washington Cabinet denies that the sale of the Philippines is contemplated.

COMING CANADIAN TEA DUTY.

The Times Ottawa correspondent wires that it is expected that the next session of the Canadian Parliament will impose a duty on tea amounting to five cents per pound.

CRETAN CHRISTIANS SURRENDER ARMS.

The Christians of Crete have publicly surrendered their arms at Canea.

GERMANY AND ENGLAND.

London, Dec. 14.

Herr von Bulow, in a speech in the Reichstag on foreign affairs, said there were all sorts of questions and many points whereon Germany can go with England and does gladly go with her, while completely maintaining her other valuable connections.

BRITISH ARMY MOVEMENTS.

The Welsh Fusiliers have left Crete for Hongkong.

FRENCH FINANCE.

London, Dec. 15.

The French Government, in deference to the Budget Committee, has waived the proposed state guarantee of any part of the Tonkin railway loan.

THE BRITISH LIBERAL PARTY.

Sir William Harcourt has written to the Right. Hon. J. Morley resigning the Liberal leadership. He states he cannot continue to lead a party rent by sectional disputes and personal interests. The papers consider the position of the Liberal party serious.

THE GOVERNORSHIP OF CUBA.

General Brooke has been appointed Military Governor of Cuba, with control over the civil and military administration.

(From the "Asahi Shimbun.")

CHINESE AFFAIRS.

Peking, Dec. 9, 10 a.m.

The Empress-Dowager, hearing that Kang Yu-wei addressed a letter to the Foreign Representatives urging them to interfere in China's domestic affairs, was highly incensed, and sent a secret mandate to the Tsung-li Yamên, which thereupon instructed the Chinese Representative in Tokyo to contrive the seizure of Kang, dead or alive.

The French Minister in Peking is adopting a most peremptory course with reference to the missionary affair, but the Representatives of Germany and England are showing much moderation, and have not yet preferred any demands.

In the middle of last month, mining operations by French citizens for gold-dust at Niuyun in Szechuan were opposed by the people of the locality and a disturbance ensued. Since that time, France has shown a disposition to send troops into the interior of China. The threat now made by the French Minister that a military expedition will be despatched vid Yunnan to Szechuan, though ostensibly on account of the missionary trouble, is really connected with the mining affair.

Later.

The German Representative showed himself calm at first, and asked only for the punishment of the officials and others responsible for the outrage committed against a German missionary, but the Chinese Government having shown itself evasive and dilatory, the Minister became angry and proceeded this morning to the Tsung-li Yamen, where he stated that, unless his demands were complied with, the troops now quartered on the island of Tsing at Kiao chou would be sent to the place where the outrage occurred to exact reparation.

France, entertaining the designs above referred to in the matter of mines, has included in her demands a provision that the privilege of mining in Yunnan and Szechuan should be granted to her.

The detachments of eight different nationalities now stationed in Peking for the protection of the Legations are to be formed into a battalion to-morrow morning, and will proceed to Sishang to engage in manœuvres.

Peking, Dec. 10.

The Chinese Government has decided on the arrest of all Reformists throughout the provinces, and instructions in that sense have been issued to the governors. The decision was come to on the 7th inst. by the Ministers of State, the moving spirit being Mr. Gunkee. The Reformists in the South are in great excitement. The discharge of Messrs. Wong Tong wu and Ju Tai-chong, it is said, originated in a charge that they had assisted the movements of the Reformists. It is reported that the Representatives of some of the Powers may offer advice to the Government.

France has threatened the Chinese Government that if the missionaries detained are not restored by the 13th inst., troops will be despatched from Tongking.

Infectious disease has appeared amongst the Russian troops at Peking.

GAME No. 462.

THE VIENNA CONGRESS.

We have here what The Field called one of Dr. Tarrasch's best, and it is certainly one of the best in the great tourney. The notes, with the two exceptions named, are by the German master, J. Mieses:—

QUEEN'S GAMBIT EVADED.

White—Mr. Burn.	Black—Dr. Tarrasch.
1—P to Q 4	1—P to Q 4
2—P to Q B 4	2—P to K 3
3—Q Kt to B 3	3—P to Q B 3
4—P to K 3

Theoretical error. 4—K Kt to ■ 3 is correct; then Black's reply would be unfavourable. As it is, the posting of B at Q 3, for White or Black, is of prime importance in the "Stonewall."

	4—K B to Q 3 !
5—Kt to B 3	5—P to K B 4
6—K B to K 2

Not best. By 6—Kt to K 5, followed by P to K B 4, would have been produced a species of "Counter Stonewall."

	6—Q Kt to Q 2
7—Castles	7—Q to K B 3 !
8—K Kt to ■ sq

The plan to break up the adverse "Stonewall" is proved incapable of accomplishment. For 9—P to K B 4 is better.

	8—Q to K R 3
9—P to ■ Kt 3 ?	9—P to K Kt 4 !
10—P to K B 3	10—K Kt to K 2
11—P to K 4	11—P to K B 5
12—P to K 5	12—K B to B 2
13—P to K Kt 4	13—Q to K Kt 2

The tendency of Black is never to permit P to Q B 5. If White play that now.

14—.....	14—P to Q Kt 3
15—P to Q Kt 4	15—P takes Q B P
16—P takes Q B P	16—Kt takes K P !
17—Q P takes Kt	17—B takes P, and wins. Tarrasch, in an unsurpassable manner has made use of all the minute weaknesses of his opponent, and has acquired a decidedly superior position. The whole game is a masterpeice of modern chess strategy.

14—K R to B 2	14—P to K R 4 !
15—R to Kt 2	15—K Kt to Kt 3
16—Kt P takes R P	16—K R takes P
17—K B to Q 3	17—K Kt to R 5
18—R to Q B 2

If 18—R to K Kt 4, Q to K R 3; 19. Q to Q B 2, Q P takes P; 20—K B takes P, K B to Kt 3, and remains with the advantage. White's game goes to smash on account of the weakness at his Q 4. 19. ■ to K 4 would have been somewhat better.

	18—Q P takes P
19—K B takes P	19—K Kt to B 4
20—K to R sq.	20—Q B to Kt 3
21—K B takes P

White has nothing better. There is to be considered here the fine variation, 21—R to Q to 2. Kt takes K P !; 22—P takes Kt, and Black mates in four moves! Dr. Tarrasch ends the game quite as energetically as elegantly.

	21—K Kt takes P
22—K B to Kt 4	22—R to R sq.
23—K R to Q 2	23—Q Kt takes P !
24—K B takes ■	24—Q R takes B
25—K R takes Kt	25—K B takes R
26—Q takes K B	26—K R takes P (ch)
27—K to Kt sq.	27—Q to R sq. !
28—Q B takes P	28—Kt P takes B
29—Q Kt to K 4	29—R to R 8 (ch)
30—K to B 2	30—Kt to Kt 5 (ch)

and White surrended.

 "This game should, at some future time, be given a place in the textbooks, not only on account of the purely classical style of play on the part of Black, but also with regard to its high theoretical importance."—Mieses.

a"* Assuredly a splendid specimen of mingled chess depths and brilliancy."—J. D. Seguin.

Notes, by Mr. D. Y. Mills.

(a) Played for the express purpose of bringing on the subsequent variation.

(b) Kt to Q B 3, leaving the Kt en prise, gives Black a good game.

(c) Had P to Q B 3 been played the sacrifice of the ■ was intended.

(d) Is there any necessity for this? Why not P to Q B 3 at once.

(e) The choice was between this and Q to Kt 3.

(f) P to Q R 3 might have led to the following continuation:—15—P takes P, P takes P; 16 R to K ■ sq, B to B 3; 17—R takes B, Q takes R; 13—R to K ■ sq, Q takes R ch, followed by P takes Kt.

(g) White also gets a good game by P to K R 3 at once, as Black cannot keep the exchange.

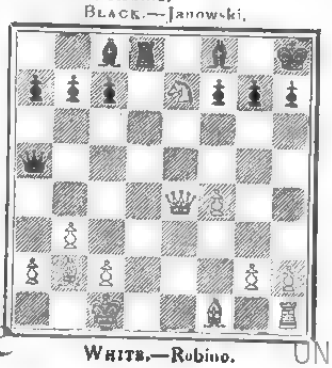
(h) A perfectly sound sacrifice, winning in all variations.

(i) Kt to Q R 3 gives a better chance of resistance; the text move loses the exchange at once, and leaves Black with a hopeless ending.

END-GAME FROM ACTUAL PLAY.

A brilliant end-game from Paris from a game played at the Café de la Regence, Paris between Janowski and M. Robino.

BLACK.—Janowski.



WHITE.—Robino.

Black, having the move, won in the following brilliant manner:—

1—.....	1—B to K B 4 !
2—Kt takes B	2—Q to Q 7 ch
3—Kt to Kt sq	3—Q to Q 8 ch
4—B to Q B sq	4—Q takes Q B ch
5—K takes Q	5—B to R 6 ch
6—K to Kt sq	6—R to Q 8, mate.

NOTES.

Janowski and Showalter have met at last at the Manhattan Chess Club, says an American Exchange, and settled all the details of their chess match. They will play until one of them has won seven games, and seven games will be played each fortnight. The contest will take places at the Manhattan Chess Club. As Showalter could not begin playing for another day or two the directors of the club engaged Janowski for a simultaneous exhibition, which was given one evening.

Janowski is said to be a smaller man than his pictures would give one the impression. He has a very dark complexion, heavy eyebrows, but large and frank eyes; a most cordial, though at first diffident manner—a man whose presence does not give evidence of the great talent he possesses, but in action exhibiting a picturesqueness and confidence in himself that indicate the source of his success. He speaks only French and German, a few words of English, not enough to permit of conversation; but his manner is so pleasant that lack of conversation without an interpreter seemed not a bar to cordiality. He classes Harry N. Pillsbury, the American champion, and Emanuel Lasker, the world's champion, above Dr. Tarrasch and thinks that he and the great champion are about equal in strength just below the other two. He thinks Lasker is a sounder player than Pillsbury, but Pillsbury possesses greater powers of combination than the world's champion. In a match, he thinks Lasker would have slightly the better chance, because of his conservatism. Despite his modest admission that he considers the others above him, he said he did not fear any of them and would not be averse to matches with them.

In the following amusing skit a writer in the Charleston News assumes the prophetic role with a success not usually attendant upon such efforts:—"Accounts from the international game between Spain and America now going on are very interesting. The first game of the series was the one between Dewey and Montojo. The former offered what will henceforth be known as the Dewey Gambit, which the Spaniard accepted. Very early in the game the latter tried to get his Castles to bear, but to no purpose. By a series of brilliant moves the American player had his adversary at a disadvantage, which he followed up in fine shape. The game lasted a little over two hours, with a victory for the American, in which he lost not a single piece. The second game, now in progress, is a consultation game. It is Sampson and Schley v. Cervera and Villamil. The Spaniards had the opening move, and essayed a Ruy Lopez. So far they have played it skilfully, but among experts the betting is heavy that the Americans will win. The whole world is watching this game with intense interest. From last accounts, which are meagre, the American players had gained a slight advantage in position. As it is a match for the best two out of three, the chances are that this will be the last game of the series."

YOKOHAMA CHESS CLUB.

There is nothing of interest to record in the Y. C.C. Nearly three months have elapsed since the beginning of the season but we regret to say, not a single match or tournament has been played so far, the attendance at the meetings being very meagre all though. This is very different to what it was last year, when the club had a most successful season, owing largely to the exceptional efforts on the part of the secretary. That gentleman seems to be unable to devote quite so much time and attention to Chess matters this year and it is to be hoped that the officers will take matters in hand energetically and by regularly attending the meetings themselves set a good example to the members. A last effort should be made to successfully conclude the handicap tournament arranged by the secretary. A challenge tournament, a consultation game, or the like, should follow soon and last, not least, a championship match. Mr. Friedlander is liable to be challenged any time after 1st January. What we should like to see is a contest between him and the ex-champion, Mr. Griffin. These two players have never met over the board in any serious game and a match between them should attract a great deal of interest and liven up matters in the Y. C. C.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, DEC. 24TH, 1898.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

MARQUIS NAKAMIKADO is dead.

THE death is announced of Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild, M.P.

THE Cricket Club dance last Tuesday evening proved very enjoyable.

THE French Chamber of Deputies passed the Indo-Chinese Railway Loan Bill.

THE Irresistible, a sister ship to the Formidable, has been launched at Chatham.

THE Chugoku Railway has been completed and was opened to traffic on the 21st inst.

MR JUSTICE HAWKINS, at the age of 81, retires from the Queen's Bench Division.

SNOW fell in Yokohama on Thursday evening. This is decidedly early for the season.

A protocol has been signed at Paris extending six months the term for ratifying the Niger Convention.

A MEDICINE vendor named Yoshihara Gentoku and his wife, living in Nagao village, Gumma, have been murdered. Their faces were covered with serious wounds. The murderer is still at large.

THE Land Tax Bill passed the House of Representatives, as amended by the Committee, on Wednesday.

SINCE the 10th inst., the issue of convertible notes by the Nippon Bank has been increased by over yen 2,800,000.

AT Baba station on the Tokaido on the 7th inst. a train collided with another and some damage was done to the track.

THE boatswain of the British ship Troop has been arrested on a charge of setting fire to that vessel on the 14th inst.

IT is reported that there are now 25 prisoners under sentence of death, and they will be executed by the 25th inst.

BRO. VIVIAN R. BOWDEN was installed Worshipful Master of the Yokohama Lodge, No. 1092, E.C., on Wednesday evening.

ON Wednesday evening, Herr Junker's Quartett party gave a most delightful Chamber Music Concert at the Public Hall.

ON the 20th fire broke out at a house occupied by a farmer at Toyotama gori, Takaido village, Tokyo, and destroyed two houses.

MAJOR MARCHAND'S party evacuated Fashoda on the 11th and are marching to Sobat. The Egyptian troops immediately occupied the fort.

THE Saké brewers in Osaka have decided to take joint action to reduce by one-half the quantity of their output, in opposition to the new tax.

A MAN was found, on the 20th, at 6 p.m., on the railway near Kanasugi, Tokyo. His body was fearfully mangled. It is believed to be a case of suicide.

H.I.M. THE EMPEROR sent presents of fish and saké to all the Cabinet Ministers as soon as it was known that the Land Tax Bill had passed the Lower House.

A YOUNG couple named Okamoto Seiko and Mushu Kaku, guests at the hotel Seiki, Kobikicho, Tokyo, committed suicide on the 14th by taking a dose of morphine.

LIEUT. YENDO and suite, who have been appointed to bring out the new torpedo-boat-destroyer constructed in England, are to leave Yokohama to-day by the steamer Hakata Maru.

ABOUT 8 o'clock on Saturday night Yamamoto Kikujiro (29), living at Tomioka monzen, Fukagawa, Tokyo, committed suicide by jumping into the river from Moegi bridge.

M. CAMBON, in receiving the French Colony in London, defined his task as defending the interests of France by proving that the interests of Great Britain and France were not irreconcilable.

AT the half-yearly meeting of the North-Borneo Company, the chairman said that the gross surplus for the half year was 80,000 dollars, and that things were prosperous all round, the prospect of development being excellent.

OVER 6,000 villagers, in Nitikawa-gori, Toyama Prefecture, proceeded to the office of the Governor to complain of the increase of the land tax. The police authorities advised them to retire and elect a committee to frame resolutions of protest. The villagers say the increase of the land tax will prevent their earning a livelihood.

RECENTLY a fire occurred in the coal mine at Otsuji, Fukuoka Prefecture, and it is still burning. The damage is estimated at about yen 600,000. The mine was producing over 500 tons per day.

MR. SHIMADA SABURO, one of the founders of the Progressist (Kaishin to) Party in 1881, has severed his connection, his views on the Land Tax increase being opposed to the position taken by the Party.

A HANDSOME woman, aged about 23 years, attempted suicide this week by cutting her throat with a knife in a train on the Kyushu Railway, near Udo station. She was prevented by passengers, and arrested.

ON the 15th inst. a man named Yamada Hikotaro (25) living at Meguro-mura, near Tokyo, murdered a gambler named Ono Sekichi (41), using a large fish knife. A gambling quarrel was the cause of the affair.

ACCORDING to a trader in Manila who recently arrived at Yokohama, business there is now almost suspended and traders are disinclined to make further contracts, fearing that the natives will oppose the U.S. Authorities.

ON the 20th inst., the new Chinese Minister to Tokyo proceeded to the Palace and had an audience of Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress. He presented his credentials and a decoration from the Chinese Emperor.

THE Times learns that Sir William Harcourt's resignation of the Liberal leadership is irrevocable, and believes that the trouble is largely due to Sir William's dislike of imperialism, which many influential Liberals favour.

A ROBBER recently entered the house occupied by a man named Miura Yoshikiyo, Minami-Futabacho, Houjo, Tokyo. Miura was absent and the robber tied up the wife while he made away with a quantity of money and clothes.

THREE men named Furukawa (45), Kamizawa (41), living at Kami Nibancho Kojimachi, and Hasegawa (46) living at Naka Kachimachi, Shitaya, Tokyo, on the 17th were arrested on a charge of having forged 5 sen nickel pieces.

THE Anti-anarchist Conference threatens to end in a failure. The representatives of Britain, Belgium, and Switzerland have declined to accept the proposal to surrender foreign anarchists on the demand of their Governments.

DURING the late stormy weather the famous Buddhist Temple of Choko, at Nagaoka, in Echigo province, was struck by lightning. The temple was built many hundred years ago and escaped the calamities of the wars of the Restoration.

JAPANESE who have been in the United States have organized a Club called the American Friendship Society, the members now numbering over 60. On the 18th inst. they held a meeting at the Maple Club, Shiba Park, and dined together.

THE Japanese vessel Shinsei Maru, after taking 53 tons of coal from the steamer Kinai Maru in Yokohama harbour, and while on the way to Tokyo, met a heavy gale and was wrecked. One of the crew was rescued by the Matayoshi Maru, but two others were drowned.

THE BANK OF JAPAN.

Two Government Bills were submitted to the House of Representatives on the 16th instant; one for increasing the Security Reserve and note-issuing power of the Bank from 85 million yen to 120 millions; the other for taxing the Bank. The details of the measures will be easily understood by referring to our report of the proceedings in the Lower House. The Security Reserve of the Bank is not a specie reserve. The Bank can, of course, issue any number of notes against which it holds a corresponding amount of specie. But against other securities—as public bonds, negotiable paper, and so on—it can not issue more than 80 million yen without the special sanction of the Minister of State for Finance, and on all over-issues thus sanctioned a tax of five per cent. has to be paid. We are not surprised that it has been thought advisable to extend the limit to 120 millions. The volume of Japan's currency is exceptionally small in proportion to her population, and the steadily growing bulk of her commercial transactions must have created a demand for some increase of the media of exchange, whatever relief has been afforded by cheques and clearing houses. Apprehension appears to be entertained in some quarters that an addition to the volume of the currency will have the effect of driving prices above their already high level of appreciation. Such a fear has no practical importance unless the point of "saturation" has already been reached; in other words, unless the hypothesis on which the Government's Bill is based be entirely unfounded, an idea which can hardly be entertained seeing that the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce is emphatically in favour of the measure. As to the taxation measure, an impost amounting to six per cent. of the paid-up capital, together with three-tenths of the net profits remaining after the allotment of dividends, seems, at first sight, very heavy. But we have to remember that the bill referred to above practically increases the Bank's resources to the extent of 35 million yen. In short, it gets 35 million yen gratis, on which it ought to be able to realize an average net profit of at least 4 per cent., thus receiving an additional income of 1,400,000 yen, which is 6 per cent. on 24 million yen, approximately, and the Bank's capital is 30 millions. These figures materially alter the complexion of the tax. The Imperial Estate holds a large number of the Bank's shares, and we shall probably find it stated in some quarters that whereas the Diet makes, with one hand, an addition of 20 millions to the Estate, it cuts away with the other a solid slice of revenue by means of this tax on the Bank of Japan. There is not much reason to expect, however, that the fine dividends paid by the Bank will undergo any diminution because of the tax. Briefly speaking, what happens is that the Bank receives from the State a loan of 35 million yen in perpetuity at 6 per cent. interest, and although the time will come when a Japanese Bank can not afford to take funds at that rate, all Japanese Banks would be pleased to do so now, as may be inferred from the fact that they are willing to pay 7 per cent. on fixed deposits.

The Budget for 1899-1900 shows that the Treasury expects to realize 1,237,000 yen from the tax which the Bank of Japan will have to pay. We have already explained the scheme of taxation. It is this:—If c be the paid up capital, then $\frac{4}{100}c$ goes, in the first place, to the shareholders out of the net profits; next, $\frac{8}{100}c$ goes to the Government, and finally the remainder becomes available for increasing the dividend to the shareholders and augmenting the reserves, provided that $\frac{3}{10}$ of the sum carried to the reserves must be handed to the Government as a further payment of tax. It will be perceived at once that the estimated yield (1,237,000 yen) of the tax represents 4 per cent. (1,200,000) of the paid-up capital, together with $\frac{3}{10}$ of 123,333 yen, in round numbers. Hence the Government's forecast of the Bank's net profits is 2,523,333 yen annually. But, as a matter of fact, the Bank's returns for the past three years show net profits of 3,849,850 yen in 1896; 14,578,512 yen in 1897, and 1,980,750 yen in the first half of 1898. The year 1897 need not be considered, for the immense profit then realized was due to the exceptional fact that the Bank was able to re-write various assets in terms of the newly fixed gold currency, thus doubling their nominal value. On the whole, 4 million yen seems to be a fair estimate of the Bank's net annual profits, without taking into account the increased income it ought to receive from the 35 million yen worth of convertible notes which it will now be entitled to add to its issues. Hence the Government's estimate is a puzzle which, in the absence of information, we can not solve.

But we agree wholly with the Jiji Shimpo that the method of levying the tax is radically bad in principle. The Jiji's reasons, indeed, do not seem to go beyond the fact that the Bank, in return for its note-issuing privileges, has to perform many troublesome and costly functions for which no special allowance is made to it. That is true no doubt. What we see, however, is that a tax on profits is faulty for two reasons; first, because it makes the shareholders unwilling to strengthen the reserves; and secondly because it deprives the Bank's officers of incentive to work. The former point becomes plain when we observe that although, if the shareholders had received a dividend of 8 or 10 per cent. they would be willing enough to make considerable additions to the reserves, they certainly will not be willing to do so if they have received only 4 per cent., especially when thirty per cent. of the sum carried to the reserves is taken by the tax-collector. The second point is equally plain when we remember that all the net profits which exceed 4 per cent. and fall short of 10 per cent. of the paid-up capital go to the tax. In other words, unless a profit of over 10 per cent. can be realized, the shareholders will not get more than 4 per cent., and unless the officials can see their way to making more than 10 per cent., they will feel that they are working merely for the sake of the tax. Surely such a method of taxation is radically bad? Would it not be a much sounder and more logical form of procedure to tax the Bank's issues of notes—say, 1½ per cent.? Hitherto the Bank's issues have been limited to 85 million yen, but it is now proposed to extend the limit to 120 millions. If the latter point was reached, the Bank's net profits would probably aggregate something like 5 millions annually, and it could afford to pay 1,800,000 yen as tax. If the issues remained at 85 millions and the profits as they are now, namely, 4 millions, the tax, at the rate of 1½ per cent., would be 1,275,000 yen. To tax the profits, especially when the rate of tax is so heavy, seems like hanging a mill-stone round the neck of the worker.

STORMY TIMES.

There appears to be a good deal of electricity in the air just at present. Mr. Momma's escapade in the House of Representatives on Thursday week; the attack on Mr. Shigeno the following day, and Mr. Tanaka's subsequent war-dance in the chamber—these were not the only "lurid" incidents of the time. Two members went for each other in a corridor of the House and two constables did the same outside the vestibule. The members were Messrs. Koyama and Chida. Meeting Mr. Chida, Mr. Koyama remarked in a casual kind of way:—"So you have been bribed." "What you mean by that?" said Chida. "Bah! It's in the newspapers," retorted Koyama, receiving at once a not unnatural slap on the cheek. Then there was a flare-up, and sergeants had to unlock the combatants. As for the constables, one appears to have reprimanded the other, and the argument speedily took the form of caps flying and swords waving, while jinrikisha coolies cheered on the combatants and vastly enjoyed the joke.

Messrs. Tanaka and Momma have been granted an interval for reflection. The former has been suspended for 7 days and the latter for 3. Tanaka had only a few minutes in the House on Saturday, but he distinguished himself by rising and gravely proposing an amendment that the estimates for the Army be cut down by 30 million yen and those for the Navy increased by 10 millions. It would have been just as relevant had he suggested a diminution of the fares for jinrikisha, so far as the business before the House was concerned; but he had entered the chamber after the opening of the sitting, and having only a vague idea that some budget of some kind was on the tapis, he ventilated his amendment on the off chance of its being in order. He was vastly tickled when the House laughed at him, and evidently thought it all a capital joke. We suspect, however, that Mr. Tanaka is getting to the end of his tether. He is a favorite with all his acquaintances outside the House, and there never has been the most shadowy accusation preferred against his sincerity and benevolence. But he can't keep his temper, and the newspapers are at last beginning to say ugly things about him. The Jiji Shimpo remarks that his extraordinary antics are due in great part to the habit into which the members have fallen of calling him "shugiin no meibutsu" (one of the celebrities of the House), whereas they ought to call him a madman: Tanaka's licence to disgrace the House will lose its efficiency if views of that kind prevail.

The stalwart politician who smashed Mr. Shigeno's head last Friday week was a certain Saito, aged 26. He belongs to Fukushima prefecture, which is Mr. Shigeno's constituency. Saito read in a local paper that the member had changed from an opponent to an advocate of increasing the Land Tax, and he determined to proceed to Tokyo and make inquiries. In Tokyo he obtained confirmation of the story, but it nevertheless seemed advisable to visit the House of Representatives and interview Mr. Shigeno. Saito took with him a bar of iron wrapped in a towel and hidden in his breast, from which it may be presumed that he had a special kind of interview in mind. Arriving at the vestibule of the House, he asked for Mr. Shigeno, and just at that moment the latter happened to come out. Saito probably inferred that heaven had taken charge of the business, for he at once proceeded to bash Mr. Shigeno's head, though he claims that he thereby did violence to his original intention.

Independent journals ridicule the notion that any comparison can be instituted between the meeting at the Imperial Hotel when Marquis Ito spoke and the assembly at the Maple Club on the 15th instant. The Ito affair bore no resemblance whatever to a political meeting. It was simply a réunion to welcome Marquis Ito, hear an account of his experiences in China and a statement of his financial opinions, and afterwards entertain him at dinner. There were no proposals, no resolutions, no announcement of a political purpose, nor anything in the shape of a demonstration. The meeting at the Maple Club, on the contrary, was not only a political meeting but an agitation in the fullest sense of the word. It was convoked by means of a violently worded political manifesto. Its object was to pass resolutions of an intimidating character, and to rouse an anti-Government crusade. The association (Hi-chiso-sō ka Domeikai) by which the meeting was organized, consisted of men who had signed a pledge of union the preamble of which ran thus:—"Inasmuch as we consider that every advocate of increasing the Land Tax is a public enemy of the majority of the people, we hereby swear, &c." Further, the advertisement published in the press over the signatures of Viscount Tani and Mr. Tomita, convening the meeting, said:—"The Government's Bill for increasing the Land Tax has already been submitted to the House of Representatives, is now in the hands of a special committee and will soon come up for discussion. It is a supremely nefarious and contemptible scheme to trample under foot the wishes of the multitude opposed to increasing the Land Tax. Therefore the crisis has come when every sincere and upright man must join a strong league to oppose such doings." If a meeting convened by means of such an advertisement, organized by men avowing such principles and such a purpose, and open to everybody choosing to join a campaign against the Government, is not a political meeting in the most unequivocal sense of the term, one may well ask what constitutes a political meeting. Viscount Tani and Mr. Tomita must have known beyond all possibility of doubt that no meeting of the kind could be lawfully held unless due notice was given to the police, and if their failure to give notice was not deliberately inspired by a desire to compel police interference and thus accentuate the agitation, started by themselves, they must be phenomenally unfit to engage in political movements of any kind.

The trial of Capt. Toulmin for the murder of a ship's compradore, excited much interest among Chinese in Canton, and precautions had to be taken by the U.S.S. Concord in anticipation of a riot.

COUNT OKUMA.

Count Okuma, speaking at a meeting of the Anti-Land-tax League, said that he had several times warned the country's leading statesmen against attempting to increase the Land Tax. Last April, he met Marquis Ito at a garden party given by Mr. Okura Kihachiro. The Cabinet of which the Marquis was then the head were understood to be framing a Budget including an increase of the Land Tax. Count Okuma took the opportunity to advise Marquis Ito that the step would prove disastrous. Again, in May, the two statesmen met at the British Legation. The Cabinet had then presented the Budget. Count Okuma strongly recommended its withdrawal, pointing out that public opinion was evidently opposed to it, and that the Matsukata Cabinet had virtually made shipwreck on the same rock. But the counsel was ignored and the Cabinet fell. Then, finally, on November 9th, Count Okuma met Marquis Yamagata at the Palace, and repeated his warning as to the trend of public opinion. But again the warning was ignored and the Cabinet have introduced a Land Tax Bill. Count Okuma left his hearers to predict the sequel of this chapter of history.

Evidently, from the above, Count Okuma intends to justify his own secession from the cause of Land Tax increase by pleading that he finds himself opposed to public opinion. Such a reason is always sufficient from a political point of view, and the only question is, has he gauged public opinion correctly? That we shall soon know. Whatever be the immediate result, however, it is a matter of keen regret, we think, in Japan's best interests, that one of her principal statesmen should have led his Party to turn their backs on her most signal financial advantage. By developing the Land Tax system she is in a position to place her finances on the soundest and most scientific basis, and if she deliberately sacrifices such an opportunity, she will injure her economical prospects materially. Count Okuma argues that this Land Tax problem divides the nation into two camps; the industrials and traders occupying one, and the agriculturists the other. He characterises it, in short, as a conflict between town and country. Such reasoning is strange. If the Land Tax were properly assessed, the inhabitants of the urban districts would have to bear precisely the same burden in proportion to their wealth as the inhabitants of the rural districts. There is no distinction of town and country in the matter.

FORMOSA-FOOCHOW CABLE.

The question as to the ownership of the cable between Formosa and Foochow has been at last settled. When Lord Li completed the transfer of Formosa to Japan in 1895, he included the cable among the island's assets, but the implementing of that part of the agreement proved very difficult, and a working agreement seems to have been only now concluded, Japan agreeing to pay a hundred thousand yen for the cable. We understand that the arrangement is unconditional: no privileges in the use of the cable are reserved to Chinese subjects, whether official or private.

FOREIGN MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS IN JAPAN.

A bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by one of the members, providing for the organization of Associations of Medical Men, and interdicting the practice of medicine by any person not a member of such an association. Approval of the measure has been announced by the Government Delegate, and in the statement of reasons attached to the bill we find an explanation that the measure is considered necessary in view of the operation of the Revised Treaties and the possible advent of foreign medical practitioners, concerning whose qualifications the general public can have no knowledge, nor any means of obtaining knowledge. In short, the Associations are to assume functions partially similar to those discharged by the College of Surgeons in England, for although they can not grant licenses to practise, they will endorse the diplomas held by desiring practitioners. This, we presume, is the method devised for judging the qualifications of foreign physicians or surgeons who may seek to practise in Japan after the complete opening of the country. Some method is obviously necessary, for it would be clearly out of the question to give an entirely free hand to any one and every one. Recklessness of that kind is not shown by any civilized country. The plan proposed should work well enough unless it is disfigured by some vexatious rules, but we may reasonably hope that such will not be the case.

STUDENTS ABROAD.

The Budget now in the hands of the Lower House makes provision for the maintenance of 75 students abroad, against 50, the number hitherto supported by the State. This increase is welcomed by vernacular newspapers, but is not considered sufficient. They allege that at least 100 ought to have the advantage of completing their education in Europe or America, and they advance as a principal reason the argument that a great want of school-teachers is felt in Japan. The cause of education has not received any of the fostering care bestowed on other institutions, especially the Army and Navy, in recent years, and the nation is beginning to be sharply conscious of the great imperfections of its educational machinery. Universities must soon be established in Kiushiu and also in the north of the empire, and the schools will have to be enlarged everywhere. Nothing presses more urgently, therefore, than the provision of an increased number of school teachers. Such is the view of vernacular newspapers. But to outsiders it seems that the main defect in Japan's educational programme is the terribly inadequate remuneration paid to her school-teachers. A cook or a house-servant is incomparably better off in the great majority of cases than a teacher in a school. It is hopeless to expect that good men will adopt a profession offering such wretched prospects, and as for students who have had the benefit of education abroad, we should think that, under present circumstances, pedagogy is the last form of employment they would select.

STATE PURCHASE OF PRIVATE RAILWAYS.

The Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, through its President, Mr. Shibusawa Yeiichi, has addressed a Representation to the Government and a Petition to each House of the Diet, urging the advisability of the State's purchasing the four principal private railways. This action on the part of the Chamber is not new. It took similar steps in the time of the Matsukata Cabinet and the last session of the Diet, but the dissolution of the Lower House and the subsequent resignation of the Cabinet defeated the Chamber's purpose. The Representation and the Petitions now forwarded are duplicates of those previously presented, but the Chamber appends a strongly worded covering document, in which it declares that the reasons formerly operative are to-day more urgent than ever, and that not an hour should be lost in carrying out the project.

The Government is already face to face with the necessity of making a large appeal to the foreign money market. A sum of 170 million yen, in round figures, has still to be raised in connexion with the post-bellum programme and the scheme of railway expansion. If to this we add 150 millions—the general estimate is 200 millions—on account of the State purchase of the four principal private roads, the total sum to be raised abroad becomes 320 million yen. The interest on that amount is 12,800,000 yen, if the loan can be floated at 4 per cent., and 16 million yen if 5 per cent. has to be paid. In other words, 12½ million yen now spent annually in the country would flow out of it. Of course, after a time, the greater part of the borrowed money would begin to be productive. Roughly speaking, that would be the case with fully 200 millions out of the 320, and if 6 per cent. were earned on the 200 millions, the interest on the foreign debt would give no trouble. But these borrowings abroad are not entirely couleur de rose. We do mean to suggest that the money market would be tightened or that anything like depression would result from the operation. On the contrary, about 250 millions of the borrowed funds would be spent in the country during the next 15 years, so that, if 12½ millions had to be sent abroad in payment of interest, some 17 millions would go into circulation at home, and the difference would more than suffice to perpetuate and accentuate the era of inflated prices. But there is another aspect of the matter. If 320 millions be borrowed abroad at 4 per cent., with a preliminary period of 5 years and a redemption period of 50 years, the country will find, at the end of the time, that it has handed back 711 millions in principal and interest to its creditors, thus paying a clear sum of 391 millions for accommodation to the extent of 320 millions. Of course there is still another aspect. Suppose that 70 millions of the borrowed money are devoted to unproductive purposes—military and naval armaments—and 250 millions to productive enterprises which give an average net return of 5 per cent. during 45 years of the 55 year period. Then the total earnings of the various enterprises would aggregate 560 millions, omitting fractions, and so it would appear that the clear gain on the whole transaction is 151 millions. Still nothing can alter the fact that, in the sequel of such a transaction, 391 million yen would have flowed out of the country, from which it appears that such operations are not to be undertaken with a light heart.

It is satisfactory to find the Jiji Shimpo raising its powerful voice on behalf of progress in the management of railways and of Tokyo's municipal affairs. Tokyo is asleep. The citizens seem quite unconscious of the villainous state of the streets and of the utter absence of improvement in means of communication. As for Japanese railways, the Jiji justly says that they have never advanced one step since the time of their construction, with the exception of the Sanyo road, whose direction show a certain measure of enterprise. The trains creep along at the same slow pace as of old. The miserable oil lamps of ancient days still defy the traveller to read by their light, and the carriages present an unaltered aspect of conservative comfortlessness. The public will open its eyes one of these days.

THE CABINET AND POLITICAL PARTIES.

There is a good deal of excitement about the dispersal of the Anti-Land-Tax Meeting at the Maple Club on the 15th instant, but the excitement is based on a misapprehension which some of the Opposition organs do not hesitate to encourage. The truth is now proved to be precisely what we supposed and stated in our last issue, namely, that the police took action, not because they considered the meeting to be prejudicial to public peace and good order, but because the promoters had failed to comply with the Law which requires that 24 hours' notice shall be given of a political meeting. That being the case, the whole affair becomes perfectly simple and explicable, so far as the police are concerned, though it is by no means easy to understand why the promoters of the meeting were guilty of neglect, the inevitable consequences of which they ought to have plainly foreseen. It is most humiliating and unfortunate that men in the positions occupied by Count Okuma and Viscount Tani should be brought into apparent collision with the police owing to such singular carelessness on the part of their political associates.

A STRANGE DOUBT.

There is a difference of opinion among the members of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce (Japanese) as to the interpretation of the Anglo-Japanese Revised Treaty. The Treaty provides for an import duty of 15 per cent. on sugar, but says that if the Japanese Government find it necessary to impose a tax on home-grown sugar, the foreign article shall be liable to the same tax. One section of the Chamber interprets that to mean that any tax imposed on Japanese sugar may be imposed on foreign sugar in addition to the Conventional duty of 15 per cent. The other section says, no; the impost levied on the foreign staple can never exceed that levied on the domestic. Information has been sought from the Departments of Finance and Foreign Affairs, but as Mr. Taguchi observes in the Keizai Zasshi, there is really no room for money.

COUNT ITAGAKI.

Count Itagaki has just expressed himself in the clearest terms on the subject of the Army and the Navy. He says that, since Japan is an island and since her policy is defensive, it may seem, at first sight, sufficient that she should have a strong navy. But it is a prime essential of defensive competence that a country should be able to assume the offensive on occasion. To do that, Japan must have a powerful army. Besides, her chances of obtaining an ally depend chiefly on the strength of her army. Her position confers upon her the unique advantage of being able to utilize her military force in East Asia. Even Russia, immense as is her military organization, would experience the greatest difficulty in placing an expeditionary force in Far-Eastern regions, to which Japan, on the contrary, has comparatively easy access. Hence Japan's value as an ally depends upon her army, and since she must be prepared to play a useful rôle in any alliance, she can not neglect her land forces. Count Itagaki alludes to China, to the Philippines, to Fukien, to Formosa and to Hokkaido as regions where an exercise of military strength might be needed, and he also refers to the celebrated speech of Mr. Chamberlain, where the Secretary of State for the Colonies said that England wanted a strong military ally. He does not actually allege that Mr. Chamberlain is to be interpreted as referring to Japan, but he certainly conveys that impression to his hearers—the members of the Pro-Land-Tax League.

THE BUSINESS TAX.

In the context of our comments on the Bank of Japan's Tax we may refer again to the bill for amending the Business Tax Law, now in the hands of a Committee of the House of Representatives. The proposed amendment is commendable in that it provides for a division of capital, and thus guarantees a foreign insurance firm which has a branch only in Japan against the injustice of having to pay a tax upon capital not used in the business of the branch. But it is much to be desired that the House of Representatives should take the opportunity of amending the tax radically. No policy can be worse than that of encouraging an insurance office to work with a small paid-up capital. The advantage that insurers have in taking out policies with the great foreign firms which keep branches in Japan is that the whole of the firm's capital is available for the payment of losses. In connexion with that the argument may be urged, of course, that the larger the capital available, the greater the inducement to insurers, and the greater the corresponding ability and obligation of a firm to pay taxes. But the same proposition may be re-stated thus:—The sounder the basis of an insurance company's organization, the more heavily it should be fined by the State; which is plainly an extravagant principle. Impartial persons must admit that a somewhat unjust element would be introduced into the competition between foreign and Japanese insurance companies if the former were allowed to attract clients in Japan by displaying a capital which is not really involved in their Japanese business. But would not that difficulty be met by levying the tax on the transactions actually undertaken—say a stamp on each policy, the value of the stamp proportionate to the sum inscribed? Then the larger the business transacted the greater the amount of the tax, and the pernicious policy would be avoided of penalizing a company because it deserves public credit. Besides, the present system has another flagrant blemish: the tax is virtually inelastic. An intelligently conceived tax ought to grow pari passú with the development of its source. But when a tax is levied in the form of a per-centage of a firm's paid-up capital, the amount of the tax remains invariable through all time, though the firm's business may multiply a thousand or ten thousand per cent. No one can pretend to discover any elements of sound finance in a system of that kind. We invite Mr. Taguchi Ukichi, or some other of the really able and liberal financiers in the House of Representatives, to take up this subject, if they can divert their attention for a moment from that unhappy Land Tax. The levying of imposts upon an insurance company's paid-up capital is a system that does no credit whatever to Japan's financial legislators.

VARIOUS ROUTES TO ONE GOAL.

There is a Chinese proverb which, translated literally, means "four in the morning and three at night" (chōshi bosan). An unintelligible aphorism as it stands, its pithiness is admirable when we get at the meaning. The origin is that a monkey trainer informed an ape of his intention to give it 3 cakes every morning and 4 every night. The news threw the ape into a state of furious discontent, whereupon the trainer amended the phrase and said, "Ah, then you shall have 4 in the morning and 3 at night," which appeased the animal at once. Chōshi bosan is the nearest equivalent we know for "six of one and half-a-dozen of the other." It is very cleverly applied by the Tokyo Asahi to the agitators against an increase of the Land Tax. They profess to be working in the people's interests but their programme is simply one of chōsi bosan, for if they propose to leave the Land Tax undisturbed, they are obliged to seek sources of additional revenue in increases of other taxes. Seven have to be obtained somehow or other, whether four come from this side and three from that, or vice versá, and it really seems as though these agitators estimated the intelligence of the nation by about the same standard as the monkey-trainer applied to the brains of the ape.

PEKING GOVERNMENT AND KANG YU-WEI.

Whatever the public may have thought of the story that the Empress Dowager had instructed the Chinese Representative in Tokyo to effect the seizure of Kang Yu-wei, dead or alive, Kang and his friends in Japan appear to attach some credit to it. Kang has decided, it is said, to hasten his departure for the United States or England, and his fellow-thinkers in Kobe have suspended the publication of the To-a Ho-Kwan. We doubt whether the arm of the Empress-Dowager is long enough to reach Japan, yet there is certainly an anti-progressive section among the Chinese in this country, and, on the whole, people would breathe more freely if Kang were safely out of the country.

JOURNALISTS, MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS, AND DRUGGISTS.

This week two Bills were presented by the Government to the House of Peers, dealing with questions which have excited a great deal of unnecessary controversy. The first was a measure to amend the Press Law so as to remove the provision restricting journalistic enterprise to Japanese subjects. We have often said that a step of that kind would certainly be taken by the Government in due season, just as we predicted in bygone years that long before the time came for foreigners to pass under Japanese jurisdiction, the objectionable clauses in the Press Law, enabling the Administration to suppress or suspend a newspaper without reference to a court of law, would be rescinded. Our confidence was ridiculed by critics who had no disposition to read the signs of the times correctly, and they will probably now elaborate some ingenuous excuse for their scepticism. But facts are stubborn things. Nothing could have been more misleading and unfair than the construction put upon the action of the Diet and the Government in connexion with the drafting of the latest revision of the Press Law. It was first alleged that a new Article had been inserted specially designed to exclude foreigners from journalistic enterprise in Japan, and when we showed that the so-called new Article had been a part of the old Law enacted years previously, the critics, instead of confessing their egregious blunder, took refuge in the subterfuge that the Diet's failure to change the Article indicated a resolve to exclude foreigners In truth the Law was enacted solely for Japanese subjects, and no thought whatever had been taken of foreigners. But there are always persons who read their own animus into the action of others. We shall be curious to see what they say now. Perhaps, with that graceful tact which renders all their recommendations so effective and welcome, they will allege that their own clamour was the means of bringing about this procedure on the part of the Government. To be consistent they must take that line, for it would never do to credit the Diet or the Government with any liberal initiative.

The second of the two bills is for enabling foreigners or Japanese who have graduated at a druggists' college or school abroad, or received a license to practise as druggists in a foreign country, to obtain, by virtue of their foreign qualification, a license to practise their profession in Japan. A similar clause exists in the Medical Diploma Law with regard to physicians and surgeons. Hence duly qualified foreigners will have no occasion to pass any examination in order to pursue the profession of medicine or dispensing in Japan. In the face of this legislation, some people may fail to see what occasion exists for the private bill now before the House of Representatives, providing for the organization of medical associations, and interdicting the practice of medicine by any one not a member of such an association. It will seem at first sight that the association device is advisable only in the absence of any other machinery to protect the people against foreign quacks or charlatans. But there is another view of the case. What is to prevent a foreigner, who has neither diploma nor license, from settling in some provincial town and setting up there as a physician or surgeon? If a man desires to engage in a deception of that kind, he will carefully refrain from making himself known to the Minister for Home Affairs and the Minister will not have any easy means of obtaining knowledge about him. The local association will constitute an excellent safeguard against anything of that kind. A practitioner who has obtained the prescribed license from the Home Department will have no difficulty in gaining admission to the association, and the mere fact of his failing to register his name will at once stamp him as unqualified, while, on the other hand, the local Japanese practitioners, being themselves members of the association, will at once know whether he has joined it. The plan seems to us excellently practical and simple.

UNVEILING OF SAIGO'S STATUE.

On the forenoon of the 18th instant at 10 a.m. the ceremony of unveiling the bronze statue of Saigo Takamori was performed in Uyeno Park. There was a great crowd of spectators, for although a space for the promoters and the specially invited guests had been curtained off, the chief incident of the proceedings was, of course, perfectly visible from without the partition. The Prime Minister, all the other Members of the Cabinet, the British Representative, the Vice-Ministers of State, and a number of other notables were present. Admiral Viscount Kabayama opened the proceedings by reading an account of the steps taken to collect money for making the statue—which cost 22,500 yen—and for organizing the affair. The project had been started ten years ago, and would have been consummated at a much earlier date had not the war with China intervened. The Emperor had subscribed liberally, and the projectors had met with a warm response in all quarters. Then Admiral Count Kawamura, who had been the great Saigo's pupil, who regarded him as a father, and yet had been compelled by duty to take a leading part in the campaign against him, spoke with deep feeling of all the noble deeds of the great soldier, statesman, and patriot; described the infinite tenderness and benevolence of his disposition, and said that in handing over to charitable institutions the balance of the fund they had collected, the promoters knew that they would be acting in accordance with the hero's wishes. Field Marshal Marquis Yamagata next read a short but beautifully composed and touching account of Saigo's life and services; and Count Katsu, who had left his sick room to attend, added his tribute to the memory of one who, though he fell fighting against the Government, was recognised by his countrymen as an unswervingly loyal soldier. The unveiling ceremony was now performed by Lady Sakura, daughter of Marquis Saigo, the Guards Band playing and the multitude sending up a mighty cheer. It is just 21 years since Saigo died, heading the great rebellion which cost thousands of lives and shook the Government to its foundations. But the nation has never misinterpreted his motives, and its heart is with the men who, if the dictates of duty and loyalty condemned them to fight to the death against their beloved chief and revered teacher, have now the deep comfort of having on his tomb the tribute of a united people's gratitude and affection.

POLITICS.

There is, of course, an aftermath of recrimination now that the fight is over. The Opposition journals insist that the day was won by bribery, and it is possible that they have some truth on their side, for the independent Asahi, though congratulating the country that a contest of such magnitude was comparatively free from any objectionable feature, thinks that the "almighty dollar" did make its appearance on the scene at the last moment, but only at the last moment and within a very narrow sphere. The Progressists do not take their beating overmuch to heart. They comfort themselves with the reflection that if they could not defeat the Land-Tax Bill, they managed, at all events, to bring about a considerable modification of its provisions; but we must confess that such a theory is scarcely acceptable. The changes made in the Government's programme were entirely due to the necessity of conciliating the recalcitrant Liberals, and had no connexion, so far as we understand, with the agitation got up by the Progressists. It is noticeable that the Jimmin (Liberal organ) emphatically denies that the country-people have shown themselves hostile to an increase of of the Land Tax. On the contrary, several constituencies intimated their endorsement of the measure. Nevertheless the Liberals have thought it prudent to publish a kind of apology in which they claim that they were influenced solely by patriotic motives in supporting an unwelcome increase of the people's burdens.

On the whole very little has been heard of the Soshi on the present occasion. He has gone out of fashion, and the country can afford to dispense with him. But on the day when the Bill came up for discussion in the Lower House, it seemed for a moment as if a free fight would take place among young men who, having escorted some of the members to the House, were waiting outside to hear the result of the voting. One of them had recourse to a knife to settle a discussion. He did not make a very effective use of the weapon, but his act had almost precipated a general collision when the police succeeded in asserting their authority.

PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AUDIT.

The enemies of Viscount Watanabe Noboru, President of the Board of Audit, have at length carried their point. He has resigned his post and it is expected that his resignation will be accepted in a few days. It was tendered some time ago, according to Tokyo journals, but could not be conveniently accepted pending the complete auditing of last year's settled accounts. An Address to the Throne impeaching the Viscount is among the measures awaiting discussion by the House of Representatives. We presume that his resignation will close the incident. The charge against Viscount Watanabe is that he exercised his authority in an arbitrary and unjustifiable manner to bring about the removal of certain members of the Board over which he presides. On more than one occasion questions have been asked on the subject in the House of Peers, and it constituted one of the recognised weapons of the Opposition when the Matsukata Cabinet was in office last year.

THE "HITACHI MARU."

We all remember how much talk there was some months ago about the Hitachi Maru, which was built at the Mitsu Bishi Dock in Nagasaki, and how there were rumours of bad riveting and slovenly work such as rendered it difficult to get the vessel passed by Lloyd's surveyor. As a matter of fact she was passed, and passed with flying colours, we believe, by an expert specially summoned from England to examine her before her final transfer to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. But that did not entirely dispel the suspicions which had been created by local talk. We have been curious, therefore, to learn what impression the ship would make when she reached England and how her maiden voyage thither would be achieved. Written reports have now been received, and it appears from them that the Hitachi behaved excellently on the voyage. Her engines worked from first to last without a hitch, driving her well in advance of her scheduled time, and her cargo was turned out without a damaged package, so that the substantial nature of her construction is placed beyond doubt. Lloyd's Committee took advantage of her presence in London to have her examined afloat by two of their principal surveyors, and in a letter subsequently addressed to the Mitsu Bishi Company in Nagasaki, the Secretary of the Committee says:—"The vessel was found to be in good condition and efficient in every respect, and the surveyors were able to make a very satisfactory report to the Committee." We also note that Captain Brown, who has superintended the building of numerous steamers for Japan in England and Scotland, writes that he considers the Hitachi Maru to "compare favourably in every way with sister-ships built on the Clyde." The Hitachi having been the first large steamer constructed in Japan, these reports have considerable interest.

LEGISLATIVE BUSINESS.

Statements which have appeared in our local contemporaries with regard to the Japanese Diet seem to be based on a misunderstanding. The Diet is accused of laziness and perfunctoriness because it has not met on several days since its official opening, and because, when it does meet, its sittings are short. But the fact is that, in the early days of the session, the business done by each House in full conclave is necessarily small, not because of any antipathy to work, but because the great majority of the members are engaged in committee duties. There are standing committees and special committees. The standing committees are the Budget Committee (45 members), the Petitions Committee (25 members) and the Disciplinary Committee (25 members). The last-named committee has generally very little to do, but the Petitions Committee has to hold long sittings every day throughout the session, and the Budget Committee, during the first fifteen days of the sessions, sits all day, and sometimes late into the night. Thus seventy members of the Lower House are fully occupied. Then there are the special committees. Every Government bill must, as a matter of law, be handed to a special committee for examination, and, pending the receipt of the committee's report, no debate or other action can take place in the House. All important private bills are also handed to special committees, and as a special committee consists at least of 9 members, it is easy to see that by the time that fifteen or twenty bills have been handed to committees, the number of members not engaged in committee work is insignificant. Thus when we read that the House of Representatives, or the House of Peers, does not meet, it is not to be inferred that the members are idling. The fact is that they are in the committee rooms, working with much greater assiduity for a much longer time than they would be working were they in their places in their House. As soon as the special committees or the Budget Committee are prepared to present their reports, then and not till then there is business for the Houses. Hence at the beginning of the session several days occur when there is no reason for the Houses to sit.

PNEUMATIC RAILWAYS.

"I was glad to learn"—writes a correspondent—"from one of your recent issues that we are to have street railways—probably efficient—in Tokyo. But I am surprised that you describe the old cylinder-and-piston locomotive, where compressed air is merely used instead of steam, as "the new American scheme." It was used in England at least 50 years ago, at first chiefly for road carriages, but afterwards for tram-cars and also for railways. It had varying success for a long time, the great trouble being the extreme coldness of the suddenly released exhaust, which caused snow and ice to form in all the pipes beyond the cylinders. Mr. W. D. Scott Moncrief designed an engine which was intended to overcome this difficulty. I can not recall the date, but I remember that when I first met him, about 15 or 20 years ago, he spoke of his invention as a thing of the past, and grumbled that the public had not appreciated it, but had taken to another type of compressed-air locomotive, which he considered vastly inferior. Of course that is a common wail of the inventor. I mention it merely to show that in, say, 1880, the compressed-air locomotive was regarded as an old established fact. It was a much discussed question twenty years ago whether compressed-air should not be used instead of steam in the underground railways of London, so as to ensure relief from the foul sulphurous atmosphere caused by the coal-burning engine. Probably compressed-air would have won the day but for vested interests, factors which, as experience shows, would array themselves at any moment against the theory of gravitation. I entertain no doubt that the Americans have made improvements in compressed-air engines, for I think they beat us in inventiveness. But let them not claim the Earth. They must get back to some period prior to 1840 before they can be regarded as the inventors of compressed-air engines. If they have managed in any way to compensate for the "tapering off" of the pressure, they have certainly done a great thing. I should not be surprised to find that the alleged improvements are mainly due to the vast increase of knowledge acquired during the past few years about the manufacture and use of mild steel."

LAND LEASES IN HYOGO.

We read in Kobe journals that the Japanese Government has cancelled the time-restriction hitherto imposed on the leasing of land by foreigners within certain limits outside the Hiogo Settlement, and we read also that this act is regarded as an acknowledgment that the restriction was in contravention of the Treaty. Such an inference seems quite erroneous. The facts are very simple. In 1867, a Convention was concluded which contained, among other provisions, a clause indicating a certain area of land for the uses of foreign settlers, and in 1868 the conditions under which the land was to be acquired and the form of lease were embodied in supplementary documents. The lease contained the words "in perpetuity," and, of course, its character was never called in question. But subsequently to the conclusion of the above Convention, an agreement was made between the Foreign Representatives and the Japanese Government with reference to lands outside the Settlement. It was decided that foreigners should be at liberty to lease such lands also—within designated limits, of course—; but whereas, with regard to land within the Settlement, distinct provisions as to the manner of sale, the annual rent, the form of title deed, and so on were laid down, no precautions of the kind were taken by the parties to the subsequent agreement relative to land outside the Settlement. The whole arrangement in the latter case was embodied in the words, "foreigners and Japanese may in future make agreements between themselves and at their own convenience for leasing land or houses." Further, it was expressly stipulated that from the arrangement with regard to land outside the Settlement "must be excepted the Concession (Settlement) ground prepared under the Convention of May, 1868," and while, on the one hand, foreign land-holders within the Settlement were required to pay a fixed and special rent to the Local Authorities, foreign lessees outside the Settlement, on the other hand, were placed upon the same footing as Japanese subjects with regard to municipal charges and Government Land Tax. Here, then, was a very clearly defined state of affairs: a certain area within which foreigners might acquire land under perpetual leases and subject to well-defined conditions, and a certain other area within which "foreigners and Japanese might make arrangements between themselves at their own convenience." Did the latter arrangement confer on foreigners the right of making perpetual leases? Did it confer on them any right independent of the laws of Japan? Obviously not. What it did was to place them on exactly the same footing as Japanese subjects for purposes of land-leasing within the designated area outside the Settlement. Japanese were bound to obey the laws of Japan in all transactions between themselves as to land-leasing and land-tenure within that area, and the diplomatic arrangement did not give them any title to disregard those laws in transactions with foreigners. Inside the Settlement, leases in perpetuity were explicitly obtainable under the distinct terms of the Convention, but outside the Settlement the arrangements as to land leases were explicitly excepted from the operation of the Convention. Now the general law of Japan fixes 20 years as the maximum term for an ordinary land-lease, but local custom used to have the force of law in these matters, and the local custom in Hyogo Prefecture being 25 years, the Governor of the Prefecture in 1884 issued a Notification in that sense for the guidance of the local authorities. To that decree strong exception was taken by certain foreigners in later years. They contended, first, that it was a distinct violation of the Convention; and secondly, that its bad faith was accentuated by the surreptitious nature of the act, the Notification having been issued "secretly." A secret notification issued by a Governor of a Prefecture is not easily conceivable; yet in that very remarkable document, the Kobe Memorial of last spring, the Japanese Government was plainly charged with "secretly issuing instructions to the Prefectural Authorities" in violation of the Convention. Apparently this accusation of secrecy is based wholly on the fact that the Notification was not communicated to the Foreign Consuls. But there was no manner of reason why it should be communicated. The agreement as to land-leasing outside the Settlement did not invest the Foreign Consuls with any manner of competence to supervise the nature of the leases. Their function was limited to "sealing and registering" the leases "as a proof of validity." On the other hand, when it was laid down that foreigners and Japanese might make agreements between themselves at their own convenience, no reasonable person can pretend to think that the limits of the convenience of Japanese subjects were extended so as to stretch beyond the purview of the laws of their country. Their natural obligation to observe those laws did not cease to be binding simply because they received permission to lease their lands to foreigners. The charge of secrecy, then, falls to the ground. There was no necessity to communicate the Notification to the Consuls, nor any concealment in the failure to communicate it. The charge of violating the Convention is dispelled by the same argument. The Convention was not in question at all, but only a subsequent agreement relating to special lands; an agreement which, as we have shown, did not confer any special privilege whatever as to the nature of the leases; did not entitle foreigners to obtain land within the extra-settlement area on terms which would have been illegal for Japanese subjects. There being, then, no violation of treaty, or convention, or agreement, the course now adopted by the Japanese Government can not be regarded as an acknowledgement that there was a violation. The new Civil Code of Japan has replaced all the old laws on the subject of land leasing, and in the new Civil Code it is provided that leases may be made for an unlimited period. It is true that the system is called chijō ken, which, being translated "superficies," presents a new-fangled and therefore suspicious aspect to fine old conservatives whose habit is to look askance at everything unfamiliar. None the less, leasing pure and simple is what the Code provides for, and the Japanese Government has evidently concluded that the most liberal way of treating the representations made on the subject of the extra settlement lands at Hyogo would be to allow foreigners to enjoy there at once the privileges which they will enjoy throughout the whole empire when the Revised Treaties go into operation. It is a question of only six months at any rate, and about such trifles a wise administration does not hesitate. Certainly the more tactful and gracious method of accepting the concession would be to acknowledge its liberality, instead of construing it as a confession that "a serious infraction of treaty rights" had taken place. Had the Japanese Government anticipated such a construction, it would not have been justified in making the concession.

NEW JAPANESE SETTLEMENT IN TIENTSIN.

It was stipulated in the new Treaty of Commerce, concluded between Japan and China in 1896, that a portion of ground should be given by the Chinese Government to form a Japanese settlement in Tientsin, distinct from the other foreign settlements already existing there. Various conferences were subsequently held to arrange the details of the grant, and the final agreement appears in the Official Gazette of the 15th instant. The site chosen is on the bank of the river and has a length of 283 yards. An additional area is also designated for purposes of provisional expansion hereafter. The leases are to be perpetual. Six copies have to be made and lodged with various officials, and the ground rent is one cash per mow. It is provided that any Chinese now residing within the fixed limits may remain there, unless the land occupied by them is required, but in the latter contingency they must remove within two months of the receipt of due notice. The purchase price of the land is not to be a matter of bargain between the Chinese holders and the Japanese settlers, but will be determined by officials of both sides appointed for the purpose. Provisions are, of course, inserted with reference to graves. These, when they contain the bodies of common people, must be removed if the purchaser of the land so desires, but the grave of a person of quality may not be disturbed unless the family to which it belongs is willing. An allowance of 10 taels is to be made to a Chinese householder who is required to remove, and there is an understanding about the building of a tramway as well as about various other matters to which we need not allude in detail.

DESTRUCTION OF THE JAPAN SILK FACTORY.

A telegram from Osaka announces the destruction by fire, at 8 a.m. on the 20th instant, of the Nihon Senshi Kaisha's factory in the Dempo-mura suburb of Osaka. The Company has a capital of a million yen, four hundred thousand of which is paid up, and the buildings destroyed are said to have covered an area of a thousand tsubo. The factory and the buildings connected with it were consumed, and one of the employes is missing. Fortunately the godowns escaped, so that the stock of raw materials and manufactured goods was saved, but the loss was nevertheless heavy, being estimated at 200,000 yen. Insurance had been effected with the Meiji Fire Insurance Company, the Nihon Insurance, and the Tokyo Fire Insurance Company for 55,000 yen each, and with the Yokohama Fire Insurance Company for 35,000 yen.

SUBJECTIVE VILLAINY.

"An analysis of the reasons actuating the members who voted for the bill would make a curious story if it could be got at." That is the verdict of a local English journal with reference to the recent debate and division in the House of Representatives on the measure for increasing the Land Tax. It is a conclusive verdict, being avowedly based on unprocurable evidence. "I could prove this fellow to be a villain if any proof were forthcoming" says the critic. No one can fail to be struck with the consciousness of ability embodied in such a judgment. The writer knows by long experience what "curious stories" he can construct for blasting the reputation of the Japanese if only some slender materials are forthcoming, and, in the absence of materials, he falls back upon the finely artistic device of hinting at what might be done were there any tangible means of doing it. This method has large possibilities, and it has also the merit of novelty. One of an audience listening to a lecture or watching a public performance of some kind, turns to his companions and says of the performer or lecturer:—"I could tell you a curious story of that fellow's life if I knew anything about his career." The persons to whom he addresses himself can not fail to be impressed. They experience a creeping sensation and contemplate the hypothetical rascal under a wholly changed aspect. He has now become in their eyes an evil mystery, and all feel vaguely convinced that they are the depositories of secret information which, though it can not be definitely proclaimed to his destruction, suffices to damn him effectually. Yes, the method is grand. It is the best way yet discovered for giving a dog a bad name, and the only moral equipment required is that we should have learned to regard our fellow creatures as dogs, which faculty was long ago developed in the subtle critic quoted above with regard to the Japanese branch of the human race.

THE EMPEROR AND THE CABINET.

It is stated that the Emperor sent a present of wine and fish, more Japonico, to each member of the Cabinet, after the passing of the Land Tax Bill; from which some people infer that His Majesty is gratified at the success of the measure. We should be disposed, however, to construe the act as an evidence that the conclusion of the weary contest between the Administration and the Legislature is welcomed by the Sovereign. For the vote on the 20th instant may fairly be considered as an end of the fight, for the present at all events.

PRINCE IWAKURA.

Rumours are circulated by Tokyo newspapers to the effect that Prince Iwakura has tendered his resignation of his post in the Imperial Household, and has left Tokyo. Our contemporaries add an explanation which appears to be purely hypothetical, namely, that the Prince used the advantages offered by his position at Court for political purposes, especially in connexion with the Land Tax Bill, which he opposed, and that he consequently finds his relations with the present Cabinet somewhat strained. We give the story for what it may be worth.

MR. SHIMADA SABURO.

Mr. Shimada Saburo has withdrawn from the Progressist Party. That result has long been considered probable, but might have been postponed permanently in view of the recent split between the Progressists and the Liberals, had not the question of the Land Tax entered an acute phase. Mr. Shimada has always advocated the advisability of recourse to the Land Tax as a means of obtaining additional revenue, and, the Progressists having now definitely constituted themselves opponents of the Tax, he could not conscientiously remain in their ranks. His friend Mr. Taguchi resigned from the Party some time ago for the same reason, and these two brilliant and influential men now stand independent. We have often heard it stated by Japanese statesmen that neither Mr. Shimada nor Mr. Taguchi is well fitted for party politics. Both are such scrupulously upright men that to make any sacrifice of conscience at the shrine of political expediency would be unbearably repugnant to them. Yet this step of Mr. Shimada's must have cost him a painful effort. He was one of the founders of the Progressist Party in 1881, and ever since that time he has defended its cause and fought its battles with not less loyalty than ability. He is a great speaker, and his high reputation makes him a tower of strength to any side which he espouses. The loss that the Progressists suffer by his defection is very serious.

THE LATE MR. ISONO.

A religious ceremony on a large scale was performed, according to Buddhist rites, on the 14th instant, at the temple Zōjō-ji, in Shiba, to commemorate the first anniversary of the death of Mr. Isono Hakaru, late proprietor of the well-known firm of Meiji-ya in Yokohama, and founder of the firm H. Isono and Company in Tokyo. Among those who assisted at the ceremony were Dr. Hamao, formerly Minister of State for Education, Professor Kikuchi, President of the Imperial University, Mr. Masujima, Mr. Iwashita, Mr. Toyokawa, Mr. Suyenobu, Mr. Dōsei, and Mr. Ikeda. Altogether there were more than a hundred present. Mr. Isono was one of a group of brilliant students, all of whom have made their mark. It is satisfactory to know that the two firms founded by him are now flourishing under the management of Mr. Yonei Genjiro, a relative of the deceased gentleman.

THE EMPEROR'S PROMISE.

One of the statements constantly and confidently advanced by the opponents of land-tax increase, is that the Emperor publicly pledged himself, in 1873, to reduce the tax ultimately to one per cent. of the assessed value of the land. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun conclusively disposes of that fallacy. It shows that the celebrated Rescript of 1873 contained no reference whatever to the Land Tax. The intention as to one per cent. was published in a Government Notification (No. 272) of that year. It was not a pledge, but simply a declaration of intention. Further, the Notification of 1873 was distinctly superseded by the Land Tax Regulations promulgated in 1885 under Imperial Ordinance No. 8. People appear to labour under a strange delusion upon that point.

HERR JUNKER'S CONCERT.

The "Junker String-quartet" made its first appearance on Wednesday evening, before a fair audience in the Vestibule of the Public Hall. Chamber-concerts exhibit a specially delicate and refined branch of music; they appeal to the connoisseur, rather than to the flâneur: and it is no matter of surprise if the counter-attractions and festivities of Christmas-week had their effect upon the attendance.

With regard to the personnel of the quartet-party:—first comes the chief—Herr Junker—who shows to the best advantage when holding the violin. Then Mr. R. Schmid—an amateur who plays like an artist and adorns everything which he touches—was Herr Junker's worthy vis-à-vis: while the inner parts were efficiently filled by Messrs. H. A. Poole and F. Schmid, the Mendelssohn and Haydn selections being well within their powers. We, at all times, bow with reverence before the great talent of the Tokyo virtuoso—Professor von Koeber—and were delighted to see and hear him again in Yokohama.

The programme (besides the well-known specimens of Haydn and Mendelssohn) contained a goodly proportion of the modern romantic school: including examples of the sombre rhapsodical Chopin—the eccentric yet sometimes charming Grieg—the earnest Brahms, whose claims to rank as a classic are not universally recognised—and the distinguished violinist Ries, who knew how to write for his instrument. These numbers were all well done; Herren Junker and von Koeber shining pre-eminently in their respective solos, while the ensemble playing was distinctly good and effective. Altogether the instrumental work was a fine display of executive ability, and well merited the applause bestowed upon it. Mrs. James Walter and Mr. R. Seel contributed songs with marked success, and Professor Von Koeber increased our debt of gratitude by playing the accompaniments throughout the evening.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1.—String Quartet in "B Major" ..... MENDELSSOHN.
Herr JUNKER, Messrs. POOLE, F. SCHMID, and R. SCHMID

2.—Aria....."Rinaldo"..... HÄNDEL.
Mrs. JAMES WALTER.

3.—Piano Solo.....Scherzo..... CHOPIN.
Prof. VON KOEBER.

4.—Sonata in "F Major" for Piano and Violin..... GRIEG.
Prof. VON KOEBER and Herr JUNKER.

PART II.

1.—Trio in "C Minor"..... BRAHMS.
Prof. VON KOEBER, Herr JUNKER, and Mr. R. SCHMID

2.—Vocal Solo..."Da neig ich unter den Bäumen"... MENDELSSOHN.
Mr. R. SEEL.

3.—Violin Solo from the "G Major" Suite
(a) "Andante Appassionato" } F. RIES.
(b) "Perpetuo Mobile" ..... }
Herr JUNKER.

4.—String Quartet
(a) Variations from the "Kaiser Quartet"..... HAYDN.
(b) Andante Cantabile... TCHAIKOWSKY.
(c) Canzonetta ..... MENDELSSOHN.

On Thursday, at 3.50 p.m., fire broke out in the kitchen at Messrs. Winkler's and Company, No. 256, Settlement. Superintendent Morgin, with the Brigade men and two hose-reels and a steamer turned out promptly and with the assistance of the Police Brigade the fire was put out in an hour. The origin of the fire was probably the overheating of the stove pipe, which is placed too near the wooden wall. Messrs. Winkler have addressed a cordial letter of thanks to the Brigade for their services.

TREATY "RIGHTS."

IT seems probable that until the Revised Treaties actually go into operation, the newspaper-reading public will continue to be entertained with theories, many of which are more amusing than instructive, as to the conditions likely to prevail when that bête noir, Japanese jurisdiction, becomes an accomplished fact. The latest of these theories emanates from Kobe—an active manufactory of all kinds of delusions at present—and has been copied with apparent approval into the columns of Yokohama journals. It is this:—

> It is provided in clause 4 of the Diplomatic Note attached to the German Treaty "that all rights acquired before or under the Treaty by nationals of the one party in the territories of the other shall remain unchanged after the expiry of the Treaty." That is to say, if any foreigner in Japan has obtained such a right as consists in a medical practice, or in the publication or editing of a newspaper, or in teaching a school, any legislation which aims at depriving him of the right would, by virtue of the most favoured-nation clause, be an infringement of the Treaties. Thus foreigners, though they owe no thanks to the British plenipotentiaries in this matter, are doubly protected by other Treaties—not only in the exercise of their professions, but in that of any private right which they may secured previous to the Treaties going into operation.

The "Treaty" referred to in the German Note is, we need scarcely say, the Revised Treaty, and one intention of the clause quoted is to guarantee perennial security of tenure to foreigners with regard to lands leased to them in perpetuity under the old Treaties. There never was any intention, of course, on the part of the Japanese Government to interfere with such tenure. The British Revised Treaty contains a perfectly clear clause on the subject in Art. XVII., where it is provided that, on the incorporation of the foreign Settlements into Japanese communes, "existing leases in perpetuity under which property is now held in the said Settlements shall be confirmed, and no conditions whatsoever other than those contained in such existing leases shall be imposed in respect of such property." That should certainly suffice for all practical purposes, since the unconditional confirmation of a perpetual lease constitutes an engagement for all time. But it might conceivably be argued that no promises contained in a treaty remain valid after its expiration, and that, consequently, the question of the foreign land-holder will again come upon the tapis at the end of twelve years from July 16th, 1898. To guard against that somewhat chimerical contingency the German negotiators inserted the words quoted above, namely, that "all rights acquired before the Treaty shall remain unchanged after its expiry." But we find also the words, "all rights acquired under the Treaty," and that is certainly an important provision. The Treaty confers many privileges which the foreign resident would be very much chagrined to lose twelve years hence. He would not like, for example, to have limits once more imposed on his area of free travel and residence; or to be forbidden to bury his dead according to the ritual of his own creed; or to be taxed more highly than Japanese subjects; or to become liable to conscription; or to have to pay heavier duties than Japanese importers, and so on. The British negotiators took these things for granted. They assumed that Japan, having entered the comity of nations, would not resort to any illiberal methods unworthy of her new association even after she had ceased to be bound by treaty. But it must be confessed that the example set by the Occidental members of the comity of nations is not such as to suggest very lofty ideals to an Oriental state. They do not all extend a hearty welcome to one another's subjects and citizens, or make things perfectly comfortable for every stranger within their gates. Hence it was, on the whole, prudent that the German negotiators should obtain from Japan some distinct pledge as to her treatment of foreigners after the Revised Treaties cease to be operative; that is to say, after July 16th, 1911. The clause quoted above embodies such a pledge and nothing more. It relates wholly to events subsequent to the expiry of the Revised Treaties. We are unable to conceive by what extraordinary confusion of ideas the clause is read as applying to the period during the operation of the Revised Treaties. Such blundering and careless interpretations of the plainest English, though they demonstrate the untrustworthiness of the interpretor, tend to confuse the public, for people are generally readier to accept the explanation of a treaty or of a law as given by a commentator than to examine the original and find out its meaning by the aid of their own intelligence. When the German negotiators asked Japan to promise that she would not deprive foreigners after 1911 of any of the privileges textually granted or practically confirmed by the Revised Treaties which become operative in 1899, they certainly could not have supposed that any one would be so ignorant of the meaning of language as to apply the promise to the period antecedent to 1911.

PASSING OF THE LAND TAX BILL.

THE Lower House passed the Land Tax Bill by a vote of 161 against 134. Since the first session in 1891, we do not remember any occasion when the members mustered in such force, there being only 5 absentees out of the whole 300, and one of them was Mr. TANAKA SHOZO who is under sentence of suspension. The Opposition made a gallant struggle, but it was a forlorn hope from the outset. The public, however, had not anticipated a majority so large as 27 in favour of the Bill even in its modified form. Up to the evening of the 19th, the organs of the Progressists spoke as if the Liberals were in danger of disruption, and neither side claimed any such superiority as the voting showed. On the 19th, however, six members seceded from the Progressist Party. Two of them were representatives of Tokyo constituencies, who doubtless found that by continuing to oppose the Bill, they would be acting contrary to the wishes of their constituents. On the same day the Liberals issued a long manifesto, justifying their conduct in voting for an increase of the Tax. The contents of the document can easily be imagined by our readers. The debate on the Bills—Reassessment and Land Tax—would have been quite unworthy of the occasion in a Western Parliament, but the fact is that the question had been thoroughly threshed out long before it came up for decision, and a lengthy discussion would have been mere waste of words. The changes made in the Land Tax Bill reduce the expected revenue from 14,550,000 yen to 7,070,000 yen in 1899-1900, and from 17,000,000 yen to 8,470,000 yen in 1900-1901. These figures include a diminution of 3 millions under the operation of the Government's Reassessment Bill. Moreover, the period of the Land Tax Bill's operation is limited to 5 years, whereas the Reassessment measure is to remain in force perpetually. Hence, if this programme be adhered to, there will be a loss of revenue amounting to 11½ million yen in 1904 5, namely, 3 million yen under the Reassessment Bill and 8½ million yen owing to the lapse of the Land Tax Bill. But of course the increased Land Tax has come to stay. It remains to be seen what measures the Government will adopt to make up the deficiency of 7½ millions in 1899-1900, and 8½ millions in 1900-1901.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

The leading columns of the vernacular press throughout the week have been filled with discussions about the proposed increase of the Land Tax. Nothing else seems to be considered worthy of attention at the moment. The various writers still maintain a semblance of examining the proposal on its merits, but it has obviously fallen to the level of a party question, and to reproduce the arguments advanced on either side would merely weary our readers. Not a single ray of new light has been shed on the subject. Count Okuma's statements to a journalist, which we have already given in full, contain everything that is to be said on behalf of the opponents of the Tax, and the contentions of its advocates having been set forth long ago, are now simply iterated and re-iterated ad nauseam. We therefore omit our usual weekly summary of the Press.

MR. JOHN BARRETT.

Mr. John Barrett, recently United States' Representative in Siam, is turning his stay in Japan to most useful account. He lectured on the afternoon of the 21st at the Waseda Semmon Gakko, and it is announced that on Sunday, the 25th, at 1 p.m., he will speak at a meeting of the Oriental Society in the hall of the Educational Society at Kanda. The Japanese are much interested at present in the prospects of commercial intercourse between their country and Siam, a subject about which Mr. Barrett can doubtless give a great deal of valuable information.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Philatelists' Almanack for 1899: London, J. M. PALMER.

WE wonder wherein lies the attraction of a postage stamp. It is seldom a beautiful object, either technically or artistically, and in order to possess any value in the philatelists' eyes, it must have ceased to be capable of performing the only function for which it came into existence, namely, carrying a letter to a given destination. Yet of all the fancies that ever influenced human beings, none has been more potent, none more permanent, than the fancy for collecting old postage stamps. Fashion exhibits strange freaks from time to time, and if the originators of some fashions could be discovered, they ought to be put in the pillory. Who was it, for example, that first conceived the idea of hanging up dinner plates as though they were pictures? The practice offends all sense of propriety, and has been carried to an excess that constitutes a veritable outrage. A grand specimen of porcelain, attractive as a study in decorative designing and colour effects, has, doubtless, many claims to be raised to the rank of a picture. But to plaster the walls of a salon with meritless, defective examples of utterly mediocre wares, as is a common habit now-a-days, must be regarded as one of the most senseless of extravagances. Stamp-collecting has at all events the advantage of being an unobtrusive mania. Its victims do not parade their foible with the offensive confidence of the plate-hanging householder. It may also be urged on their behalf that the larger their collection, the wider their knowledge of geography. But they don't collect for the sake of studying geography. That is pretty certain. Neither have we ever heard one of them dilate upon the beauties of a stamp. Rarity seems to be the prime factor of value. In Mr. J. M. Palmer's "Philatelist's Almanack" for 1899, we read of certain stamps which are "regarded as marvellous and most valuable specimens." What is the matter with them! What entitles them to such enthusiastic epithets? Why simply that only 200 of them exist, and their limited number is due to a misprint which was discovered after these 200 had been struck. The memorable event happened last February at the Kurachi City Post-office. Two sheets, containing ten rows of twenty stamps each were misprinted, and of these Mr. Palmer, "after the severest competition obtained eighty-four specimens, which rise in value every day, for as the reputation spreads the enquiries are almost overwhelming, I having kept them on purpose." It would not be easy to devise a more striking illustration of the intellectual and artistic motives of the philatelist. Mr. Palmer guarding in his imposing four-storeyed warehouse in the Strand these eighty-four Kurachi misprints, which are daily rising in reputation and for which he is almost overwhelmed with enquiries—that is a picture which only a philatelist can truly appreciate. However, if we can not enter into the spirit of the stamp-collector, we can at all events see that the "Philatelist's Almanack" must be a highly useful publication to those interested in such matters, and for their sake we regret that the enterprising Mr. Palmer talks of ceasing to issue the little volume.

Fairy Tales from Japan, by Miss SUSAN BALLARD.

MISS SUSAN BALLARD, of the St. Hilda's Mission in Tokyo, has just published a most attractive volume of Japanese "Fairy Tales." The authoress calls them translations, but they are entirely free from any of the peculiarities of style that so often disfigure work of that kind. There is a preface by Mrs. Isabella C. Bishop, and there are two prefatory parts; the first a short essay on the Shinto cult and the Buddhist creed, and the second—which, to our thinking, is not by any means the least interesting portion of the volume—, "a true story for my child-readers," giving a touching and beautiful account of Miss Ballard's experiences in a small town near the base of Fuji-san, where she seems to have passed some years of her missionary life. The so-called "fairy tales" would not all belong to that category according to the Japanese definition, for although "Momotaro," "The old man who made the Trees blossom" "Kachi-kachi Mountain," and the "Man with the Wen" are certainly fairly tales in the approved acceptation of the word, the "Magic Mirror" is simply an exquisitely pathetic story of a girl's love for her dead mother, and as for the adventures of "Hiko-hoho-demi-no-Mikoto," and "the Sword of the Assembled Clouds of Heaven," one might as well include among English fairy tales the history of the sun and moon of Joshua, the Apostles' wonderful fishing, the Pillars of Fire and Cloud, or the piling up of the Red Sea. More wonderful, indeed, than any fairy tale is the faculty so many of us possess, the faculty of accepting implicitly all the miracles of our own religions, and rejecting as mere myths the miraculous legends of every foreign faith. These points will matter little, however, to Anglo-Saxons for whom Miss Ballard writes. Her volume can not fail to delight a great many young folks, and a great many old too, for the matter of that. It is printed by the Religious Tract Society of London, but the illustrations are Japanese, and the cover is a Japanese design of much beauty. We presume that the book is to be obtained in Japan, and we strongly recommend it to our English readers.

Who's Who, Edited by DOUGLAS SLADEN.

"WHO'S WHO" continues to occupy its old place in public esteem. It is now in the fiftieth year of its existence and the second of its new issue under the editorship of Mr. Douglas Sladen, who has evidently brought a large amount of ability and enterprise to the work. The book steadily grows in size. It to-day contains no less than 846 pages of closely written matter, and is certainly the most exhaustive and compact record now published of the notabilities of Great Britain. Many useful tables are given at the beginning, and altogether we do not see how any one can afford to be without such a work.

THE IMPERIAL DIET.

FRIDAY, DEC. 16TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers did not meet, the Standing and Special Committees alone assembling.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.05 p.m.

THE LATE SCENES OF DISORDER.

The President, Mr. Kataoka, who had been absent for some days owing to illness, referred briefly to the events of the preceding day. He considered it very regrettable that the work of legislation should have been suspended owing to want of order in the House, and he expressed a hope that the members would assist him to preserve the discipline essential to the discharge of business.

Mr. Fujisawa desired to call the President's attention to what had happened in the last session. The Vice-President had, in the first place, suspended the sitting on the ground that the House was disorderly. When the House re-assembled, half an hour later, the Vice-President, after announcing that one of the members should be handed over to the Disciplinary Committee, had immediatly declared the sitting closed, without even giving out the business for the following day. There was nothing in the Rules to warrant such procedure. The 73rd, and 74th Articles of the Standing Orders provided that the President might declare the sitting closed if the business on the Order of the Day had been completed, or, even before it was completed, if the usual hour for closing, namely, six o'clock, had come. No other case was contemplated. Further, it was distinctly laid down that, by way of preliminary to the rising of the House, the President should notify the Order of the Day. It appeared, therefore, that the action of the Vice-President had been irregular and unwarrantable, an insult to the House, and an unlawful interruption of its business. There was no doubt that it lay within the President's discretion to suspend the sitting if such a course was necessary for the preservation of good order. But when the House re-assembled after its recess on the preceding day, there had not been any symptoms of disorder, and from no point of view did a satisfactory explanation of the Vice-President's action present itself.

Mr. Mitamura spoke in a similar sense, and the House began to show signs of impatience at the close of his remarks.

Mr. Inouye Kakugoro wanted to know what they were doing. He had heard something about calling attention to something, but they appeared to be having a kind of debate without any question before the House. So far as yesterday's events were concerned, the author of the disturbance had been handed over to the Disciplinary Committee, and his case was now being investigated. The House had nothing to do but to await the result of the inquiry. He understood one of the last speakers to complain that the business of the House had been interrupted on the preceding day, but it seemed to him that these gentlemen were successfully endeavouring to interrupt the business themselves to-day. If they had any motion to make, let them make it manfully, and fight the matter out.

Mr. Sato attempted to speak, but was interrupted by cries of "Needless," "Needless."

The President said that the action taken by the Vice-President on the preceding day had been in accordance with Art. III of the Law of the Houses, which provided that, when the House was in a state of excitement, and it was found difficult to maintain order, the President should have power either to close the meeting for the day or to suspend it. As for the closure of the sitting without any notification of the Order for the following day, there was a precedent for that course.

Mr. Fujisawa denied that the Article quoted had been applicable. The House was not in a disorderly condition when it re-assembled after suspension. There were no signs of excitement, nor any indications that order would be difficult to maintain. The Vice President he would not say ran away, but, at any rate, advanced to the rear.

The President saw no reason to add anything to his previous explanation.

Mr. Hoshi Toru said that the instance of closing the sitting without giving out the order of the following day had occurred under the presidency of Dr. Hatoyama Kazuo. He suggested that the facts should be read to the House from the Records.

Mr. Oaka Ikuzo attempted to speak in defence of the Vice President, but could not obtain a hearing.

Mr. Tanaka Shozo had not intended to take any part in this discussion, but found it impossible to remain quiet when a jurisconsult like Mr. Hoshi Toru advanced such propositions. A bad precedent was always a bad precedent. The fact that a mistake had been made once did not justify its repetition. If the President did not correct his own errors, the House was unable to correct them.

OUTRAGE WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

The President, taking advantage of a moment of calm, announced that the Order of the Day would now be proceeded with, but before any progress could be made, a report was handed to him, which he read to the House. It was to the effect that Mr. Shigeno Kinjuro, a member of the House, had just been attacked on the steps leading to the entrance, and had received a contused wound on the head, 3 inches long and penetrating to the skull.

Mr. Hayashida, the Chief Secretary, read the medical report about the injury.

Mr. Hoshi Toru asked whether the author of the outrage had been apprehended.

The President replied that he had been arrested instanter.

Mr. Hoshi expressed sympathy with Mr. Shigeno. Doubtless his assailant had been "a fellow of the opposite party" (kantai-to no yatsura).

Mr. Tanaka Shozo sprang to his feet and cried out that such rude expressions were intolerable. He called upon the President to take proper measures for Mr. Hoshi's restraint.

MR. TANAKA AGAIN EXPELLED.

The President making no response, Mr. Tanaka hastened towards the rostrum, calling out "Deal with him, deal with him;" and, finally ascending the dais, seized the President's arm. The President ordered him to withdraw from the Chamber. Mr. Tana continued his clamour, and when the sergeants came to enforce the order, he resisted violently, repeating his demand, and shouting "we must know what Mr. Hoshi means." He was finally pushed out through the door behind the President's seat, struggling and vociferating all the while.

TANAKA SHOZO HANDED OVER FOR DISCIPLINE.

Mr. Inouye Kakugoro intimated that he desired to introduce an urgency motion for handing Mr. Tanaka to the Disciplinary Committee, and he asked permission to have the Order changed for the purpose of debating his proposal.

This action elicited numerous exclamation of assent and dissent from all parts of the House, and the President announced that an unsigned ballot would be taken to decide whether the Order should be changed. The result of the ballot was that 145 voted for changing the Order and 135 against it

Mr. Inouye Kakugoro then formally moved that Mr. Tanaka Shozo be handed over to the Disciplinary Committee. He reminded the House that when Mr. Takata Sanaye had been attacked outside the precincts of the Diet, the Party to which he belonged (the Progressists) had not hesitated to declare in the House their belief that his assailant was a member of the Ri-tō (Government Party). If Mr Hoshi had been betrayed into a corresponding expression of suspicion in the present case, that did not constitute any justification of Mr. Tanaka's singularly violent conduct; above all, of his unpardonable procedure in mounting the dais and actually laying hands on the President. Such an act was a gross violation of the sanctity of the House and must be duly punished.

An unsigned ballot was taken at once, the President announcing that no discussion would be permitted. The result was that 145 voted for the motion and 140 against it.

NEW BILLS.

The Order of the Day having been resumed, the Special Committee reported unanimously in opposition to the Government Bill for amending the Silk Conditioning Warehouse Law, in the sense of abolishing the Kobe Warehouse, and the House voted against the Second Reading, without any discussion.

Two Government Bills sent down from the Upper House—one for amending the Law of Grants in Aid of deceased Officials' Families, and one for changing the Boundaries between Chiba and Ibaraki Prefectures—were then handed to Special Committees.

A Government Bill for levying Tonnage Dues on Foreign or Domestic Ships entering Japanese Ports was then read and handed to a Special Committee. The chief provisions of the proposed Law are that vessels entering a Japanese port must pay dues of 10 sen per registered ton (Japanese measurement), but that a single payment of 30 sen per ton will entitle a vessel to free entry for one year. The dues must be paid by the master of the ship to the Custom House on her entry, and failure to pay will involve liability to a fine of three times the amount of the defalcation. Vessels putting into a port through stress of weather or owing to injury received at sea are to be exempt from the payment, and the Superintendent of Customs is to have the right of taking the measure of a ship at any time. The date of the Law's operation is to be fixed by Imperial Ordinance. In the Statement of Reasons appended to the Bill, it is explained that the clearance payments hitherto levied on ships have been irrespective of the carrying capacity of the vessel, which is manifestly unjust.

THE BANK OF JAPAN.

The next Bill on the Order was a Government measure for increasing the Security Reserve of the Bank of Japan from 85 million yen to 120 millions, a change which simultaneously confers on the Bank the privilege of making an additional issue of 35 million yen of untaxed convertible notes. The Bill does not disturb the privilege already enjoyed by the Bank of making unsecured issues on payment of a tax of 5 per cent. The reasons assigned for increasing the Security Reserve, and therefore the volume of the convertible paper currency, are (1) growth of the economical society; (2) expansion of national territory; (3) increase of population, and (4) the change of the currency system to a gold basis. The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

A Government Bill was then introduced for taxing the Bank of Japan, on the ground that the enlarged note-issuing power granted to it by the Bill just read would greatly increase its profits, and the State had a right to share those profits. The tax is to be imposed in two ways. In the first place, the Treasury is to receive, out of the Bank's net profits, 6 per cent. of its paid up capital, provided that the dividend to shareholders does not fall below 4 per cent. of the said capital. Secondly, the Bank is to pay to the Government one-third of the sum remaining after it has made the minimum appropriation on account of its reserves against losses and for the equalization of dividends. The latter point requires a word of explanation. The present Regulations of the Bank do not prescribe any limit of dividend, or fix any ratio between total net profits and sums carried to reserves. They merely provide that out of the sum available for reserve purposes after the dividend has been subtracted from the net profits, at least one-tenth must be carried to the reserves for covering losses and equalizing dividends, the other nine-tenths being, of course, available to swell the general reserve or the next year's account. Hence it will be seen that the scheme of taxation projected by the Bill is simply this —six per cent. on the paid-up capital out of the sum appropriated to dividend, and three-tenths of the remaining net profits. The tax is to be imposed from January 1st, 1899. The Bill was handed to the Special Committee charged with the duty of reporting on the previous Bill with regard to the Bank's Security Reserve and note-issuing power.

MEDICAL MEN'S ASSOCIATIONS

A Bill was then introduced by Mr. Suzuki Manjuro for organizing Medical Men's Associations (Ishi-Kai) in the cities, prefectures, districts, and divisions; the names of members to be published in the Official Gazette and entered in local registers on payment of a registration fee of three yen; no one to be allowed to practise medicine unless he is a member of such an association; and the penalty for any violation of the Association's rules to be determined by the Minister of State for Home Affairs in consultation with the President of the Central Sanitary Bureau, on receipt of a report from the Local Governor covering a resolution passed at a general meeting of the association to which the offending member belongs. The appended statement of reasons says that the measure is necessary in view of the operation of the Revised Treaties and the probable advent of foreign medical practitioners, concerning whose qualifications some method of supervision and verification must be provided in the interests of the public.

Dr. Hasegawa Tai, Government Delegate and President of the Central Sanitary Bureau, stated that the proposed measure had the Government's approval.

The Bill was handed to a Special Committee, and the House rose at 3.30 p.m.

SATURDAY, DEC. 17TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers did not meet.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.07 p.m., and received the report of the Budget Committee with reference to four supplementary budgets for the current fiscal year, all of which were passed without debate.

The Bill sent down by the House of Peers for amending the Law with reference to the Registration of Lands in Hokkaido granted to Immigrants, was then handed to a special committee.

THE SUSPENDED MEMBERS.

Mr. Nishihara Seito, on behalf of Disciplinary Committee, reported that the Committee had considered the cases of Mr. Momma and Mr. Tanaka Shōzo, and had decided that Mr. Momma, having created a disturbance in the House, should be suspended for 7 days, and that Mr. Tanaka Shōzo, having been guilty of an offence against the dignity of the House, should be suspended for 14 days.

Dr. Hatoyama moved that the House, following precedent, should go into secret session to consider these recommendations.

Mr. Hoshi Toru thought that, in view of the importance of the subject, it should be placed on the Order of the Day, and discussed after due notice.

The House adopted Dr. Hatoyama's motion, and went into secret session at 1 40 p.m. The sitting was re-opened at 4 45 p.m., when it was found that the House had reduced the sentences of the Disciplinary Committee to 3 days in the case of Mr. Momma and 7 days in that of Mr. Tanaka.

The House rose at 4.50 p.m.

MONDAY, NOV. 19TH, 1898.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.20 a.m.

AMENDING THE PRESS LAW.

The first Bill on the Order was a Government measure for amending the Press Law so that the 6th Article should read:—"No person under the full age of 21 and not actually a resident of Japan may become publisher, editor, or printer, &c.," thus rescinding the restriction as to nationality in the existing Law.

The Government Delegate explained that this change in the Law was desirable in view of the impending operation of the Revised Treaties, so that foreigners might enjoy the privilege of engaging in newspaper enterprise in Japan.

No questions were asked, and the Bill was handed to a special committee.

FOREIGN CHEMISTS AND DRUGGISTS.

The second Bill was a Government measure for amending the Chemists' and Druggists' Regulations, so as to read:—"Any person who, having attained the full age of 20 years, has graduated from the druggists' section of a foreign university, or from a druggists' school, or who possesses a druggists' license entitling him to practise in a foreign country, may apply for a license to practise in Japan by virtue of the said certificate of graduation or license to practise; and the Minister of State for Home Affairs, after examining the said documents, may grant a license, without requiring the applicant to pass any examination."

In the Statement of Reasons appended to the Bill it was explained that the object of the proposed amendment was to bring the Chemists' and Druggists' Regulations into accord with the Regulations for Medical Diplomas, the 14th Article of which says:—"Any person who has graduated from the medical section of a foreign university or from a medical school, or who possesses a license to practise medicine in a foreign country, may apply for a license to practise in Japan by virtue of the said certificate of graduation of license to practise, and the Minister of State for Home Affairs, after examining the said documents, may grant a license without requiring the applicant to pass an examination."

The Government Delegate explained that this measure also was requisite in view of the operation of the Revised Treaties, and the Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

NATIONALIZATION BILL.

Viscount Tani, Chairman of the Special Committee, having reported favourably on the Nationalization Bill, it was passed through its Second and Third Readings without debate.

FORMOSA.

The Second Reading of the Bill for extending for five years the operation period of Law No. 63 of 1896, by which legislative competence is vested in the Governor-General of Formosa, was then taken. Mr. Izawa proposed an amendment, not of the Bill, but of the Law itself, and this provoked a long debate, the Government's supporters contending that a motion to amend the text of a law was not in order when the only question before the House was whether the operative period of the law should be extended; and the Opposition claiming, with considerable heat and insistence, that when they were invited to consider the advisability of keeping a law in force or allowing it to become inoperative, there could be no doubt about the propriety of proposing amendments of the law itself. In an amended form they were willing to extend its period of operation, but in its present form they must vote against it. The debate lasted nearly two hours, but the only interesting point elicited was a statement by Dr. Goto, head of the Civil Government in Formosa, that a sum of 14,000 yen had been distributed among the bandits who made act of submission, and that 7,000 yen had been spent on the construction of roads, in which work they were employed.

The House rejected Mr. Izawa's amendment and voted the Second Reading. Another motion by the same member for the throwing out of the Bill was also negatived by a large majority, and the Third Reading was passed.

OTHER MATTERS.

A private Bill for granting special immunity in respect of Land Tax to inundated regions, having been approved by the Government Delegate provided that the resulting loss of revenue did not exceed 500,000 yen, was handed to a special Committee.

The Supplementary Budgets for the fiscal year 1898-9, sent up from the Lower House, were handed to the Budget Committee, with instructions to report on them in a week, and the House rose at 1.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The House of Representatives met at 1.10 p.m.

BUDGETS AND GOVERNMENT MEASURES.

The Chairman of the Budget Committee, Mr. Kurihara, having reported favourably on a Supplementary Budget for 1897-8, it was passed without debate.

The following Government Bills were then handed to special committees:—

A Bill for bringing the inhabitants of Hokkaido, Okinawa, Ogasawara, and the Seven Islands of Izu within the purview of the punitive classes of the Indirect National Tax Law.

A Bill for abolishing the system of official purchases of sugar in Okinawa (Riukiu). According to the appended statement of Reasons, it has long been the custom for the Government to purchase certain qualities of sugar from the islanders, and having deducted therefrom the amount of the tax on barley and beans, to hand over the remainder to the islanders, the sugar being subsequently sold and the proceeds lodged in the Treasury. But the system was now found to have an injurious effect on free competition, and the Government desired to discontinue it after March 31st, 1899.

The Bill for abolishing the tax imposed in Okinawa Prefecture on vessels spreading more than a certain area of canvas was then passed through its Second and Third Reading.

PRIVATE BILLS.

A private Bill was introduced, by Mr. Shigeoka Kungoro, for making an amendment in the appendix to the General Statutory Tariff, in the sense of abolishing the import duty upon salted fish (kangyo). Mr. Shigeoka said that the number of Japanese who proceeded to the coasts of Siberia and Karafuto was increasing every year. Great quantities of salted fish were sent back to Japan by these enterprising men, and a correspondingly large and growing export of Japanese products was taking place to the same regions. The duty which the new Tariff proposed to put upon salted fish would have the effect of killing the industry and therefore also closing one market for Japanese goods.

The Bill was handed to a Special Committee.

Mr. Kimura and some other Independent and Progressist members, introduced a Bill for re-assessing the taxable value of land. They contended that greatly improved facilities of communication had rendered the price of rice and the rate of interest virtually uniform throughout Japan, and that no reason existed why a uniform system of re-assessment should not be adopted so as to remove the existing inequalities of incidence. Therefore they proposed that the price of rice and the amount of produce should be determined by taking the average of the 6 years from 1894 to 1897, omitting the year of greatest yield and lowest price as well as the year of least yield and highest price, and that when all necessary deductions had been made on account of expenses —due attention being paid to the increased price of fertilizers—, the taxable value of the land should be found by regarding the net produce as six per cent. of that value. They expected that the resulting value would be five or six times the present figure, and they proposed that the tax should be fixed at 1.3 per cent.

The Bill was handed to the Land Tax Committee, and the House rose at 2 p.m.

TUESDAY, DEC. 20TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers did not meet.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.05 p.m.

FINAL READINGS.

The following two bills were passed through their Second and Third Readings:—

Bill for extending the Military Court-martial System to Formosa.

Bill for the better Preservation of Military Secrets.

With regard to the latter Bill, Mr. Takagi Masatoshi called attention to the fact that a person travelling by rail from Nagaura to Yokosuka can see not only the forts on the latter place, but also the number of ships undergoing repair in the Docks. Did the Government intend to change the route of the line, or would some other precaution be adopted, as it was obviously impossible to forbid foreigners to travel by the railway?

The Vice-Minister of War replied that the question was of considerable importance, and he preferred to answer it at a future date in writing.

STUDENTS ABROAD.

Mr. Inouye Kakugoro introduced a Representation urging that 50 students should be sent abroad annually at the expense of the State to acquire practical instruction. The period of instruction should be ten years, and for the first four years the number should be increased by 50 annually until a maximum of 200 was reached, after which the number would remain constant for six years, and from the 11th year the students should return at the rate of 50 per annum. Allowing 250 yen a year for each student, the total outlay for 50 would be only 12,500 yen.

The Representation was handed to a special committee.

THE LAND TAX.

Mr. Ooka Ikuzo, Chairman of the Special Committee on the Government Land Tax and Reassessment Bills, as well as on Mr. Kimura's Re assessment Bill, reported that, since its appointment on the 12th instant, the Committee had had several sessions, and on two occasions had obtained the attendance of the Minister of State for Finance. Finally, by a vote of 14 to 12, the Committee had adopted certain amendments, namely, (1) the reduction of the proposed increase of Tax from 1.5 per cent. to 0.8 per cent. in the case of rural districts, and the raising of the increase to 2.5 per cent. in the case of urban lands, thus making the total rate for rural lands 3 3 per cent., and that for urban lands 5 per cent.; (2) the limitation of the period of increase to 5 years, inasmuch as only 7 years remained of the period of exceptional outlays on account of the post-bellum programme, the last two years of which period would require only trifling outlays, and inasmuch as, in 5 years time, the income from customs duties would probably show a great growth; (3) the addition of a clause providing that the altered rate should not go into force until after the reassessment of the taxable value of the land, and that it should be levied on the reassessed value; and (4) the inclusion of the island of Tsushima, Nagasaki Prefecture, in the scheme of reassessment. With regard to the Reassessment Bill, it was, in effect, identical with measures which had received the endorsement of the House ever since the 2nd session, and the majority of the Committee had found no difficulty in approving it. The difference between the Government's Bill and Mr. Kimura's Bill was that the former went on the principle of putting down the elevated points in the value of the land and the latter on the principle of raising the depressions. Hence the adoption of the Government's measure involved the rejection of that of Mr. Kimura. Concerning the arithmetic of the Committee's amendments, the broad facts were that whereas the Government's plan would add 14½ million yen to the revenue in 1899-1900 and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

17 millions in subsequent years, the Committee's scheme would give an addition of only 7 millions in 1899-1900 and 8¼ millions in subsequent years, and after 1904 the burden of the Land Tax would become 3 millions less than it is at present. He moved that, as a matter of urgency, the Order of the Day be changed for the purpose of debating these Bills at once.

Mr. Hoshi Toru seconded the proposal for urgency, and moved that the Reassessment Bill be taken first

At this stage the Ministers of State, with the exception of Marquis Yamagata, entered the House.

Several members asked questions, Mr. Kudo Kokan making himself conspicuous by the number of his queries and the persistence with which he pressed them. He repeatedly asked Count Matsukata to explain what measures the Government contemplated taking to make up the deficiency which would result if the Committee's amendments were passed, but Count Matsukata declined to say more than that it would depend upon the nature of the vote. The House finally grew impatient of this questioning and proceeded to debate the Bills, the Order of the Day having been changed and Mr. Hoshi's motion, as to the sequence of deliberation, passed.

Mr. Taketomi Takitoshi, in a long speech, presented a report on behalf of the minority of the committee. He repudiated the idea that the opponents of Land Tax increase were unwilling to vote the funds necessary for the progress of national affairs, and declared that the whole question was how to provide funds, not whether they should be provided. The first point to be determined was whether the expenditure of 223 million yen included in the Budget was a proper figure. Pending the settlement of that point, it was not possible to form a really intelligent judgment about methods of augmenting the revenue. But even if they agreed that such an outlay was inevitable, the Land Tax would still be an unwise source of additional income, for a tax on land was radically bad. It was an impost not sanctioned by sound principles of national economy. Its effect, briefly speaking, was to impoverish the agricultural classes for the sake of enriching the merchants employed by the Government. There were 20 millions of agricultural folks in the Empire, and upon their prosperity depended the prosperity of the country. If they were in straitened circumstances, the consequences became at once apparent in the towns, and were also felt by the railways, the telegraphs, the post offices, and in many other directions. As for the contention that the proposed increase of tax would fall chiefly on the land-owners and would be little felt by the tenants, the fact was that the number of large land-owners was incomparably smaller than the number of those whose holdings were barely sufficient to support them. Theorists had a great deal to say about the taxes paid by the nation in former times, but their whole argument was vitiated by failure to appreciate the differences between the era of feudalism and the era of constitutional government. It was quite beside the mark to contend that the Land Tax levied under the rule of the Tokugawa was heavier than the Tax levied to day, for in Tokugawa times men paid taxes blindly as a kind of tribute to their superiors, whereas now they paid them for a definite purpose approved by themselves. Further, the Emperor himself had promised publicly in the year 1873 that the Land Tax should be gradually reduced to one per cent. of the value of the Land. They were told that by increasing the Tax the finances would be placed on a sound footing, but such a proposition could not be reconciled with the fact that a tax which depends on the yield of land is eminently unreliable, being subject to fluctuations in connexion with numerous causes. Taxes ought to be imposed on the actual income of the tax-payer, not on the source of his income. In no other country was the land required to bear such burdens as in Japan. If they examined the statistics of Occidental States, they would find that the Land Tax never exceeded $\frac{1}{21}$ of the total public revenue, whereas in Japan it was ¼. Could it be asserted of such States that their finances were not on a sound footing? If they made the proposed addition, even of only 0.8 per cent., the market price of land would immediately fall by 20 per cent. He then elaborated the point that the communes were already taxed above their strength for purposes of local expenditure, and that to increase their contributions to the Central Treasury would involve the collapse of local autonomy. Altogether he did not hesitate to denounce the Government's scheme as ill-considered and senseless. This vacillating condition of the Finance Minister's mind was well illustrated by the record of his attitude towards the tax, for he had gradually agreed to shift his ground first from 4 per cent. to 3.3; then from perpetuity to 7 years, and finally from 7 years to 5.

Mr. Taguchi Ukichi spoke in favour of the measure, and traversed Mr. Taketomi's statements from point to point. He showed that in Europe, and especially in England, the land contributes largely to the income of the State, and that in feudal days it constituted a chief source of local income. It was quite impossible for Japan to derive her revenue from indirect taxation, as was the case in England, and, according to the most advanced theories of political economy, she was very fortunate in being able to rely on the land. As a matter of fact, the result of the change in the system of currency and of the re-assessments twice effected in recent years was that the Land Tax had been reduced to about one-third of its original figure, and on no principle of equity could it be contended that the public treasury was not entitled to a share of this unearned increment. With regard to the contention that the burden of any addition would fall chiefly on the tenant farmer not on the landlord, it was hardly necessary to expose a fallacy which a student of a primary school could detect at once. As between the Sake Tax and the Land Tax, the former bore much more heavily on the inferior classes than the latter. He had heard with astonishment that funds to defray local expenditures were derived chiefly from the Land Tax, and that if the latter were increased for the purposes of the central Treasury, the system of local autonomy would collapse. In point of fact, as the House well knew, local expenditures were defrayed almost entirely from the House Tax, the Business Tax, and the Miscellaneous Tax. Attention must be called, also, to a serious error in Mr. Taketomi's speech. He had averred that an Imperial Rescript issued in 1873 contained a promise to reduce the Land Tax gradually to 1 per cent. No such promise could be found in any Rescript. A Government Notification of 1873 did contain a statement of intention to reduce the Tax as other imposts increased, but the Notification had been superseded by one of more recent date.

At this point the closure was put and carried.

Mr. Hoshi Toru proposed that the voting be by unsigned ballots.

Dr. Hatoyama proposed that the ballots be signed.

A division being taken on this point, showed 157 in favour of Mr. Hoshi's proposition, and 138 against it. The announcement of the numbers was received with loud cheering as an indication of the voting on the Bills themselves.

An open ballot was then taken as to whether the Bill for Reassessing the Taxable Value of the Land should be read a second time, when 166 voted for the Second Reading and 129 against. The Second Reading was taken at once and the Bill was finally passed.

The ballot for the Second Reading of the Land Tax Bill, as amended by the Special Committee, resulted in 161 "ayes" and 134 "noes," and the members of the Opposition, seeing that their cause was completely lost, trooped out of the chamber, so that the final ballot on the Bill resulted in 151 votes for it and only 15 against.

The President announced that the House would not meet on the following day, and the session closed at 7.30 p.m.

THURSDAY, DEC. 22ND.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.10 a.m., and, having received reports from Special Committees on the following measures, passed them with scarcely any debate or opposition :—

NEW BILLS PASSED.

Supplementary Budget No. 4 for the 31st year of Meiji (1898-9), (sent up from the Lower House) providing a sum of 100,000 yen as the purchase price of the submarine cable between Formosa and Foochow; and a sum of 900 yen by way of payment for the three remaining months of the fiscal year at the rate of 300 yen monthly, to the Great Eastern Telegraph Company in consideration of working the cable.

Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Chemists and Druggists' Regulations.

Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for Special Remission of the Land Tax in the case of inundated districts.

Concerning this measure, the Government Delegate said that the loss of revenue involved would not exceed 210,000 yen.

OTHER MATTERS.

The following bills were handed to Special Committees :—

Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for extending to Okinawa, Hokkaido, Ogasawara, and the Seven Islands of Izu, the System of dealing with Transgressions of the Indirect Taxation Regulations.

Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for abolishing the Shipping Tax in Okinawa.

The President having obtained sanction for placing upon the Order of the following day the two bills sent up from the Lower House for increasing the Land Tax and Reassessing the Taxable Value of Land, the House rose at 10.35 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.10 p.m., and proceeded at once to receive the report of the Special Committee on the Bill for increasing the Saké Tax, together with five correlated Bills.

THE SAKÉ TAX.

Mr. Otsu Junichiro, on behalf of the Committee, reported that all the Bills were recommended for the House's approval, with slight amendments. Briefly speaking, the Governments' proposals were to move the tax 12 yen per koku in the case of Refined Sake, Sweet Sake, and White Sake which had hitherto been subjected to an import of 7 yen only, and also to levy 12 yen a koku on Unrefined Sake instead of the 6 yen now levied. The tax on spirits and alcohol was to be raised from 8 yen a koku to 13 yen; the private brewing of Sake for domestic use was to be altogether interdicted, and licenses for brewing fermented liquors were not to be granted to persons manufacturing less than 100 koku of refined sake, 50 of Unrefined, or 5 of Spirits or Alcohol annually.

Mr. Takagi Masatoshi pleaded for a reduction of these rates, especially in the case of Unrefined Sake. The agricultural classes, he said, were about to be called on to pay an increased tax on their land, and it seemed hard that they should have to pay a greatly increased price for their favourite beverage also; a beverage which might be regarded as one of their articles of diet. What added to the hardship of the new legislation was that the private brewing of domestic sake was to be interdicted, whereas it was upon liquor thus brewed that the lower orders chiefly depended. He moved that the rate be lowered to 11 yen for Refined Sake and 10 for Unrefined.

Mr. Otsu Junichiro, though in the name of the Committee he had reported favorably on the Bills, was also desirous of seeing the rate reduced. The Government Delegate had stated that the Treasury needed from this source 23 million yen of additional revenue, and it appeared that such an amount could be obtained by fixing the tax at 11 yen for both Refined and Unrefined Sake. The rates designated in the Bill would probably give an augmented revenue of 30 millions, and there did not appear to be any reason for raising more revenue than was actually required. He moved that the 12 yen per koku set forth in the Bill be altered to 11 yen.

Both of these amendments were rejected by the House, and after some debate on minor points, the whole series of bills were passed as presented by the Government, with the trifling alterations suggested by the Special Committee.

OTHER BILLS.

The Bill (sent down from the Upper House, for remitting the Registration Tax under certain circumstances in the case of Land granted to Hokkaido Immigrants) was then passed without opposition.

The General Budget for 1899-1900 stood next on the Order, but the House, having decided to postpone its consideration until the following day, rose at 2.50 p.m.

JAPANESE LITERATURE.

By Clay MacCauley.

Archaic Writings.

5. KOKINSHIU—But the manyokana, as a means for Japanese literary expression, was altogether too cumbersome and difficult for continued and enlarged use. Consequently, as writing in the language of the people increased, the ideographs that had been utilized for phonetic purposes became simpler and more conventional. At about the time the "Manyōshū was finished, from among these ideographs two syllabaries, the katakana (757), and the hiragana (834), were formed, and a free writing of the Japanese language at last became possible. These syllabaries were gradually extended in use, and at the close of the ninth century gained honoured recognition as the medium for embodying Japanese speech by their adoption in the writing of the preface to, and in the transcription of, a new collection of poems made under imperial order: the "Kokinshū," or "Ancient and Modern Songs" (905). These poems show at its full fruition whatever poetic excellence the Japanese people have gained. They are to-day the most studied and most quoted of all the many gatherings from Japanese song.

Spring.

[These verses and the three following stanzas are taken from the "Kokinshū," B H. Chamberlain's translation. The "Kokinshū" (Collection of Songs Ancient and Modern) was compiled 905-922, by Kino Tsurayuki and others. Sosei, the writer of these verses on Spring, was a Buddhist abbot living in the latter part of the ninth century.]

Amid the branches of the silvery bowers
The nightingale doth sing: perchance he knows
That spring hath come, and takes the later snows
For the white petals of the plum's sweet flowers.

Summer.

[Written by Henjō, who was a Buddhist bishop and one of the leading men of his time 830-890. Prior to his taking the vows of religion Henjō was prominent in court circles, and was married. The poet Sosei was his son.]

O Lotos leaf! I dreamt that the wide earth
Held naught more pure than thee,—held naught more true:
Why then, when on thee rolls a drop of dew,
Pretend that 'tis a gem of priceless worth?

Autumn.

[By Chisato. Vice-governor of Iyo, etc.; a prolific writer,—850-900]

A thousand thoughts of tender vague regret
Crowd on my soul, what time I stand and gaze
On the soft-shining autumn moon; and yet
Not to me only speaks her silvery haze.

Winter.

[Tsurayuki, the writer of these lines, was probably the leading poet of his day,—880-950 He compiled the "Kokinshū" He was also the first master of Japanese written prose. His preface to the "Kokinshū." and his diary the "Tosa Nikki," marked the beginning of a new age in Japanese literature.]

When falls the snow, lo! every herb and tree,
That in seclusion through the wintry hours
Long time had been held fast, breaks forth in flowers
That ne'er in spring were known upon the lea.

6. HYAKUNIN-ISSHIU — Among many collections of Japanese verse there is one called the "Hyakunin-isshū," or "Single Songs of a Hundred Poets," which, though gathered probably as late as the thirteenth century, may be noticed here because it contains many excellent specimens of the versification, distinctive in Japanese literature, written in much more ancient times. Tradition ascribes the collection to Teikakeo (Sadaiye Fujiwara) a poet living at the time of the reign of the Emperor Shijō. One among several stories told of the collection runs that in the month of May, 1235 (the second year of Bunreki) the poet was asked by a relative, Utsunomiya Yasaburo, to write some poems for the decoration of shōji in his new country house at Ogura, a village near Kyoto. Sadaiye choosing them at random in memory and not on account of their exceptional excellence, wrote down this series of verses. Another tradition is that the poet chose the poems as decoration for shōji in his own house at Ogura. They consist each of a single stanza made up normally of but thirty-one syllables arranged in five measures; the first and third measures being, as a rule, in five, the second, fourth and fifth in seven syllables. This "Century of Songs" in time became well known; and now in the form of a game at cards the songs are familiar in most Japanese households.

Illustrative Translations.

1. An Emperor's Sympathy.

[The first ten of the "Hyakunin-isshū" are here given. They are from an unpublished translation of the work by the present writer. The metre of the Japanese originals, with a trochaic cadence, has been preserved in the translations, and, as far as possible, faithful renderings of their meanings made.

The first poem is ascribed to the Emperor Tenchi, 668 672. It is supposed to be an expression of his sympathy with his subjects to whom had fallen the hard lot of being workers in the rice-fields The temporary huts built by them at harvest time did not protect the laborers from the season's fogs and rains. The Emperor, in imagination, had sought shelter in one of these huts.]

Of an autumn rice-field, roofed Loosely with coarse-rushes,—
While my garment's sleeves grow wet
With the moisture dripping through.

2. Mount Ama no Kagu:—A Picture.

[Ascribed to the Empress Jitō.—690 696. In summer Mount Ama no Kagu, rising near Nara, was often white with clothing spread on it to dry by the people of the villages lying at its base, The Empress with that scene in mind wrote her song. It may be descriptive of a late fallen snow on the mountain]

Haru sugite
Natsu kinikerashi
Shirotae no
Koromo hosu teu (chō)
Ama no Kagu yama.

Spring, it seems, has passed
And the summer come again,
For the silk-white robes,
So 'tis said, are spread to dry
On the "Mount of Heaven's Perfume."

3. A Song of Longing.

[Written by Hitomaro Kakinomoto, who flourished at the close of the seventh and early in the eighth centuries. This song contains a good illustration of the "Pillow word" and "the Preface," so common in Japanese verse. The first three lines, or "part," of the song serve no other purpose than to introduce the longing lament of the last two lines, or "part." An instructive paper on the unique characteristics of Japanese verse, written by Prof. Chamberlain, is published in the fifth volume of the "Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan"]

Ashibiki no
Yamadori no o no
Shitari o no
Naka naka shi yo wo
Hitori ka mo nen.

Ah! the foot-drawn trail
Of the mountain pheasant's tail,
Hung like drooping branch!
Through this long, long dragging night,
Must I keep my couch alone?

4. Beauty made Perfect.

[Akahito of Yamabe, writer of this song, lived a few years later than Hitomaro, and shares with him the reputation of greatest excellence among the poets of ancient times. In these verses the poet intends to call to mind the lovely landscape of the coast of Tago, made complete in beauty as one of its parts, Mount Fuji, receives a covering of snow]

Tago no ura
Ni uchi idete mireba
Shirotae no
Fuji no taka ne ni
Yuki wa furitsutsu.

When to Tagu's coast
I my way have ta'en and see
Perfect whiteness laid
On Mount Fuji's lofty peak
By the drift of falling snow!

5.—The Stag's Cry in Autumn.

[Written by Sarumaru by office Tayu (an office at a Shintō shrine). The song tells of the deepening of autumn's melancholy by the plaintive cry of a stag heard from the depths of mountain forests.]

Oku yama ni
Momiji fumi wake
Naku shika no
Koye kiku toki so
Aki wa kanashiki.

In the mountain-depths,
Treading through the crimson leaves,
Cries the wandering stag.
When I hear the lonely cry,
Sad, how sad, the autumn is!

6.—A Winter Midnight in the Palace Court.

[Yakamochi, by office Chūnagon, or Imperial Adviser, is much esteemed for his poetic ability. He flourished towards the close of the eighth century. In these verses he notes the far advance of the night, by the increase of frost on the timbers of the "Magpie Bridge." This bridge was a passage in the Court of the Imperial Palace to which the name, applied by popular superstition to the "Milky Way" of the skies, was given.]

7. A THOUGHT OF HOME.

[Written by Nakamaro of Abe at a farewell party given to him by some friends in China on his return to his home near Nara, Japan.]

Ama-no-hara

Mikasa no yama ni
Ide shi tsuki ka mo.

In the "Plain of Heaven,"
When I look, a moon I see.
In Kasuga land,
On the Mount of Mikasa,
Has the same moon there appeared?

8. A BUDDHIST'S QUESTION.

[The priest Kisen, writer of these verses, lived at Mount Uji not far from the capital city, Kyoto. The nearness in pronunciation of the ushi (gloom) to that of the word Uji (name of his home) prompted him to carry on his serious reflections by means of a pun, a device very common in Japanese verse. His home is pleasant, and peaceful. Why has it been so misnamed? Or, why, indeed, are men pessimists concerning the world?]

Waga io wa
Miyako no tatsumi
Shika zo sumu
Yo wo uchi yama to Hito wa iu (iu) nari.

At my humble home,
South-east from the capital,
Live the timid deer.
Yet, this pleasant world of mine, (ours,)
Men have named a "Mount of Gloom."

9. VANITY OF VANITIES.

[Written by Komachi, of Ono, a famous poet living in the middle of the ninth century, 834-880. She was also famous for her beauty. In this poem Komachi plays upon the resemblance between the sounds of the words naga ame, "long rain," and nagame "gazing," or "long looking.' She associates also her beauty with a flower's colour. As the latter perishes under the long rains, so her beauty has passed while she has given her time to trivial things.]

Hana no iro wa
Utsuri ni keri na

Waga mi yo ni furu
Nagame seshi ma ni.

Colour of the flower
Has already passed away,
While on trivial things
Vainly I have set my gaze,
In my journey through the world.

10. AT THE OZAKA BARRIER.

[Just before reaching Kyoto on the Tōkaidō, one passes Ozaka, an important hill road crossing a low ridge, through a narrow valley. In ancient times an imperial Guard House was placed there. Past that barrier travellers to and from Kyoto and the east must go. The poet Semimaru played upon the words Osaka (Great Incline) and Ausaka, (Meeting Slope), in his picture of the busy scene there.]

Kore ya kono
Yuku mo kaeru mo
Wakarete wa
Shiru mo shiranu mo
Ausaka no seki.

This, see! This is where Travellers who go or come
Over parted ways,
Friends or strangers, all must meet—
'Tis the gate of "Meeting-Hill."

AGE OF THE PROSE CLASSICS.

900-1200 A.D.

Japanese literature, having received a vehicle adequate to its expression, and indorsement by the highest authority, with the opening of the ninth century entered upon an era lasting for nearly four hundred years; an era in which, with the co-operation of the general maturing culture of the empire, it passed through what is now known as its classic age. During these four centuries the capital of the empire lost the nomadic character it had had from time immemorial. With the removal of the imperial family from Nara in 794, the capital became fixed in Kyoto, to stay there for the next eleven hundred years. Through these four centuries the national development was for the most part serene. The ruling classes entered upon a career of high culture, refinement, and elegance of life, that passed however in the end into an excess of luxury, debilitating effeminacy, and dissipation. During the best part of these memorable centuries Japanese literature as belles-lettres culminated; leaving to after times, even to the present day, models for pure Japanese diction. The court nobles of the eleventh and twelfth centuries had abundant leisure for the culture of letters, and they devoted their time to that, and to the pursuit of whatever other refined or luxurious pleasures imagination could devise. For instance, among the many notable intellectual dissipations of the age were reunions at daybreak among the spring flowers, and boat rides during autumnal moonlighted nights, by aristocratic devotees of music and verse who vied with one another in exhibits of their skill with these arts. The culture of literature in the Chinese language never wholly ceased; but from the ninth to the thirteenth centuries the creation of a literature in the language of the people was the chief pastime of the official and aristocratic Japanese. Before the rise of the Shōgunate at the close of the twelfth century, no less than seven great compilations of the poetry of the times were made.

Especially notable among the works of this classic age are the prose writings. Critics call attention first to the diary of a famous poet, Tsurayuki: notes of a journey he made in 935, from Tosa where he was governor, to Kyoto the capital. This diary, the "Tosa Nikki," is said to be not only a simple and attractive story of travel, but to be the best extant embodiment of uncontaminated Japanese speech. Then there remain from the same epoch many "romances" or "tales," monogatari, now much studied and valued for their linguistic excellences. Probably the earliest among them, the "Taketori Monogatari," or "Story of a Bamboo Cutter" (850-950) which tells of the fortunes of a Moon-maiden exiled for a while in this world, is said to have, for purity of thought and language, no rival in Japanese or Chinese fiction. The "Ise Monogatari," or "Story of Ise" (850-950), has also admiring critics. Its prose and poetry are both studied as models to-day, its poetry being ranked next to that of the "Kokinshū." The "Sumiyoshi" and the "Yamato Monogatari" (900-1000), too must be named as choice tenth-century classics. The culmination of Japanese classic prose, however, as nearly all critics agree, was reached with the writing of the "Romance of Prince Genji," and the "Book of the Pillow." The "Genji Monogatari" (1003-4), and the "Makura no Sōshi" (1000-1050), both appearing early in the eleventh century. They are the work of two ladies of the court, Murasaki Shikibu and Sei Shōnagon. The "Genji" romance leads all works in Japanese literature in the fluency and grace of its diction; but the "Pillow Book" is said to be matchless in the ease and lightness and general artistic excellence of its literary touch. These works stand as the consummate achievements of the classic age in prose. They mark also the end of this memorable literary epoch. At the close of the twelfth century Japan became a battlefield for civil wars. War and the interests of war became supreme. Learning and letters were gradually relegated to priests, and literature soon ceased to exist. The Chinese language again became the chief vehicle of whatever literary work was done.

HOW THE SEA WAS CALMED.

[From the "Tosa Nikki;" W. G. Aston's translation. Tsurayuki traced his descent from one of the Mikados. He held office his life throughout. This diary was written in 935, on the return journey from Tosa, a province he had been governing, to Kyōto the capital.]

Meanwhile a sudden gale sprung up, and in spite of all our efforts we fell gradually to leeward, and were in great danger of being sent to the bottom! "This god of Sumiyoshi," said the captain, "is like other gods. What he desires is not any of the fashionable articles of the day. Give him *nusa as an offering." The captain's advice was taken, and nusa were offered; but as the wind, instead of ceasing, only blew harder and harder, and the danger from the storm and sea became more and more imminent, the captain again said, "Because the august heart of the god is not moved for nusa, neither does the august ship move: offer to him something in which he will take greater pleasure." In compliance with this advice I thought what it would be best to offer. "Of eyes I have a pair; then let me give to the god my mirror, of which I have only one." The mirror was accordingly flung into the sea, to my very great regret. But no sooner had I done so than the sea itself became as smooth as a mirror.

DISCOVERY OF THE ISLE OF IMMORTAL YOUTH, MOUNT HŌRAI.

[From the "Taketori Monogatari," 850 950; translated by F. Victor Dickins. Authorship unknown, but ascribed to one Minamoto Jun. Materials of the story taken from Chinese and Indian sources. This extract is part of a description of the wanderings of a Japanese Ulysses.]

Then the Ancient fell to busying himself with putting the chamber in order, and after a while went out and accosted the Prince again, saying, "Your servant would fain know what manner of place it may be where grows this tree,—how wonderful a thing it is, and lovely and pleasant to see!" And the Prince answered: "The year before yester-year, on the tenth of the second month, we took boat at Naniwa and sculled out into the ocean, not knowing what track to follow; but I thought to myself, what would be the profit of continuing life if I might not attain the desire of my heart; so pressed we onwards, blown where the wind listed. If we perished even, what mattered it? While we would make what way we could over the sea plain, and perchance thus might we somehow reach the mountain men do call Hōrai. So resolved, we sculled further and further over the heaving waters, until far behind us lay the shores of our own land. And as we wandered thus, now deep in the trough of the sea, we saw its very bottom; now blown by the gale we came to strange lands, where creatures like demons fell upon us and were like to have slain us. Now, knowing neither whence we had come nor whither we tended, we were almost swallowed up by the sea; now, failing of food we were driven to live upon roots; now again, indescribably terrible beings came forth and would have devoured us; or we had to sustain our bodies by eating of the spoil of the sea. Beneath strange skies were we, and no human creature was there to give us succour; to many diseases fell we prey as we drifted along, knowing not whitherwards, and so tossed we over the sea-plain, letting our boat follow the wind for five hundred days. Then about the hour of the dragon, four hours ere noon, saw we a high hill looming faintly over the watery waste. Long we gazed at it, and marvelled at the majesty of the mountain rising out of the sea. Lofty it was and fair of form, and doubting not it was the mountain we were seeking, our hearts were filled with awe. We plied the oar and coasted it for two days or three, and then we saw a woman arrayed like an angel come forth out of the hills, bearing a silver vessel which she filled with water. So we landed and accosted her, saying, "How call men this mountain?" and she said, "Tis Mount Hōrai;" whereat our hearts were filled with joy.

The Maid of Unai.

[From the "Yamato Monogatari," 900-1000, translated by B. H. Chamberlain. The author of these "Stories of Yamato" (Old Japan) unknown, but said to have been, in part at least, the retired Emperor Kwanzan, 983-985. The stories contain nearly three hundred poems.]

In days of old there dwelt a maiden in the land of Settsu, whose hand was sought in marriage by two lovers. One, Mubara by name, was a native of the same country-side; the other, called Chiku, was a native of the land of Idzumi. The two were alike in years, alike in face, in figure, and in stature; and whereas the maiden thought to accept the wooing of him that should the more dearly love her, lo! it fell out they both loved her with the same love. No sooner faded the light of day than both came to do their courting, and when they sent her gifts the gifts were quite alike. Of neither could it be said that he excelled the other, and the girl meanwhile felt sick at heart. Had they been men of luck-warm devotion, neither would ever have obtained the maiden's hand; but it was because both of them, day after day and month after month, stood before the cottage gate and made evident their affection in ten thousand different ways, that the maiden pined with a divided love. Neither lover's gifts were accepted, and yet both would come and stand, bearing in their hands gifts. The maiden had a father and a mother, and they said to her:—"Sad is it for us to have to bear the burden of thine unseemly conduct in thus carelessly, from month to month and from year to year, causing others to sorrow. If thou will accept the one, after a little time the other's love will cease." The maiden made answer, "That likewise was my thought. But the sameness of the love of both has made me altogether sick at heart. Alas! what shall I do?"

Now in olden days the people dwelt in houses raised on platforms built out into the river Ikuta. So the girl's father and mother summoning to their presence the two lovers, spake thus: "Our child is pining with a love divided by the equal ardour of your worships. But to-day we intend, by whatever means, to fix her choice. One of you showeth his devotion by coming hither from a distant home: the other is our neighbour, but his love is boundless. This one and that are alike worthy of our pitying regard." Both the lovers heard these words with respectful joy; and the father and mother continued:—"What we have further in our minds to say is this: Floating on our river is a water-bird. Draw your bows at it; and to him that shall strike it will we have the honour to present daughter." "Well thought!" replied the lovers twain; and drawing their bows at the same instant, one struck the bird in the head and the other in the tail, so that neither could claim to be the better marksman. Sick with love, the maiden cried out:

"Enough, enough! Yon swiftly-flowing wave
Shall free my soul from her long anxious strife;
Men call fair Settsu's stream the stream of life,
But in that stream shall be the maiden's grave!"

and with these words, let herself fall down into the river from the platform that overlooked it.

While the father and mother, frantic with grief, were raving and shouting, the two lovers plunged together into the stream. One caught hold of the maiden's foot and the other of her hand, and the three sank together and perished in the flood. Terrible was the grief of the girl's father and mother, as, amid tears and lamentations, they lifted her body out of the water and prepared to give it burial. The parents of the two lovers likewise came to the spot, and dug for their sons graves beside the grave of the maiden. But the father and mother of him that dwelt in the same country-side raised an outcry, saying, "That he who belongs to the same land should be buried in the same place, is just. But how shall it be lawful for an alien to desecrate our soil?' So the parents of him that dwelt in Idzumi laded a junk with Idzumi earth, in which, having brought it to the spot, they laid their son. And to this day the maiden's grave stands there in the middle, and the graves of her lovers on either side.

Court Festivals in the Eleventh Century.

[From the "Makura no Sōshi," 1000-1050; W. G. Aston's translation. The author, Sei Shōnagon, was a direct descendant from a Mikado, and was for some time chief lady-in-waiting to the Empress. With the death of her mistress in the year 1000 she left the court, entered a convent, and there composed this "Pillow Book," a masterpiece in Japanese prose.]

What delightful anniversaries festivals are! Each one brings its special pleasures, but none to my mind is so enjoyable as New Year's Day. It is early spring time then, when the weather is settled, and the morning breaks serenely. A quiet haze is spread over hill and dale, which the sun disperses when he rises, and shows the dewdrops sparkling in his rosy beams. The world seems glad and happy, and in the shining faces of the neighbours, glowing from the frosty air of morning, content and peace is plainly written. How pleasant it is to watch them as they pass, in holiday attire, intent on making their congratulations to their master, and ignorant the while that their very lightness of heart is an unconscious compliment to themselves.

It is the 7th day of the month when people, tempted by the fineness of the weather, go out in company to pick the wakana (wild pot-herbs). The snow is off the ground and great is the excitement amongst the ladies of the court, who have so seldom the opportunity of a country trip. What fun to watch the farmers' wives and daughters, arrayed in all their hoarded finery, and riding in their wagons (made clean for the occasion) as they come to see the races in the court-yard of the palace. It is most diverting to observe their faces from our grated windows. How prim and proper they appear, all unconscious of the shock their dignity will get when the wagon jolts across the huge beam at the bottom of the gate, and knocks their pretty heads together, disarranging their hair, and worse still, mayhap, breaking their combs. But that is after all a trifle when compared to their alarm if a horse so much as neighs. On this account the gallants of the court amuse themselves by slyly goading the horses with spear and arrow point, to make them rear and plunge, and frighten the wenches home in fear and trembling. How silly too the men-at-arms look, their foolish faces painted with dabs of white here and there upon their swarthy cheeks, like patches of snow left on a hillside from a thaw.

Then there is the 15th of the first month, when appointments for the next four years are made. How eagerly candidates for office rush here and there through falling snow and sleet, with their memorials in their hands? Some have the jaunty air and confidence of youth; but others, more experienced, are weary and dejected-looking. How the old white-headed suitors crave an audience of the ladies of the palace, and babble to them of their fitness for the places they seek. Ah! little do they suspect when they have turned their backs what mirth they have occasioned! How the ladies mimic them—whining and drawling!

On the Character of Women.

[From the 'Genji Monogatari,' 1004, paraphrased by Kenchō Suyematsu. This romance of Prince Genji was written by Murasaki Shikibu, a lady of noble birth and a member of the great family of the Fujiwara, who were at the time practically rulers of Japan. It is said that not only does the classic literature of Japan find consummate illustration in this story, but that the history of the time, especially in its social characteristics, is here most vividly set forth.]

"How varied are the characters and the dispositions of women! Some who are youthful and favoured by nature strive almost selfishly to keep themselves with the utmost reserve. If they write harmlessly and innocently, yet at the same time they are choice in their expressions, which have delicate touches of bewitching sentiment, this might possibly make us entertain a suddenly conceived fancy for them; yet they would give us but slight encouragement.

"Among characters differing from the above, some are too full of sentimental sweetness; whenever occasion offers them romance they become spoilt. Such would be decidedly better if they had less sentiment and more sense.

"Others, again, are singularly earnest, indeed—in the performance of their domestic duty; and such, with their hair pushed back, devote themselves like household drudges to household affairs. Man, whose duties generally call him from home all the day, naturally hears and sees the social movements both of public and private life, and notices different things, both good and bad. Of such things he would not like to talk freely with strangers, but only with some one closely allied to him. Indeed, a man may have many things in his mind which cause him to smile or to grieve. Occasionally something of a political nature may irritate him beyond endurance. These matters he would like to talk over with his fair companion, that she might soothe him and sympathize with him. But a woman as above described is often unable to understand him, or does not endeavor to do so; and this only makes him more miserable. At another time he may brood over his hopes and aspirations; but he has no hope of solace. She is not only incapable of sharing these with him, but might carelessly remark, 'What ails you?' How severely would this try the temper of a man!

"If then we clearly see all these, the only suggestion I can make is that the best thing to do is to choose one who is gentle and modest, and strive to guide and educate her according to the best ideal we may think of. This is the best plan; and why should we not do so? Our efforts would not be surely all in vain. But no! A girl whom we thus educate, and who proves to be competent to bear us company, often disappoints us when she is left alone. She may then show her incapability, and her occasional actions may be done in such an unbecoming manner that both good and bad are equally displeasing. Are not all these against us men? Remember, however, that there are some who may not be very agreeable at ordinary times, yet who flash occasionally upon us with a potent and almost irresistible charm."

Thus Suma-no-Kami, though eloquent, not having come to one point or another, remained thoughtful for some minutes, and again resumed.

"After all, as I have once observed, I can only make this suggestion: That we should not too much consider either birth or beauty, but select one who is gentle and tranquil, and consider her to be best suited for our last haven of rest. If in addition she is of fair position, and is blessed with sweetness of temper, we should be delighted with her, and, not trouble ourselves to search out or notice any trifling deficiency. And the more so as, if her conscience is clear and pure, calmness and serenity of features can naturally be looked for.

"There are women who are too diffident and too reserved, and carry their generosity to such an extent as to pretend not to be aware even of such annoyances as afford them just grounds of complaint. A time arrives when their sorrows and anxieties become greater than they can bear. Even then, however, they cannot resort to plain speaking and complain; but instead thereof they will fly away to some remote retreat among the mountain hamlets, or to some secluded spot by the seaside, leaving behind them some painful letter or despairing verses, and making themselves mere sad memories of the past. . . .

"Worse than this, the woman—led astray perhaps by ill advice—may even be beguiled into more serious errors. In the depth of her despairing melancholy she will become a nun. Her conscience when she takes the fatal vow may be pure and unsullied, and nothing may seem able to call her back again to the world which she forsook. But as time rolls on, some household servant or aged nurse brings her tidings of the lover who has been unable to cast her out of his heart, and whose tears drop silently when he hears aught about her. Then when she hears of his affections still living, and his heart still yearning, and thinks of the uselessness of the sacrifice she has made voluntarily, she touches the hair on her forehead, and she becomes regretful. She may indeed do her best to persevere in her resolve, but if one single tear bedews her cheek she is no longer strong in the sanctity of her vow. Weakness of this kind would be in the eyes of Buddha more sinful than those offenses which are committed by those who never leave the lay circle at all, and she would eventually wander about in the 'wrong passage.'

"But there are also women who are too self-confident and obtrusive. These, if they discover some slight inconsistency in men, fiercely betray their indignation and behave with arrogance. A man may show a little inconsistency occasionally, but yet his affection may remain; then matters will in time become right again, and they will pass their lives happily together. If therefore the woman cannot show a tolerable amount of patience, this will but add to her unhappiness. She should, above all things, strive not to give way to excitement; and when she experiences any unpleasantness, she should speak of it frankly but with moderation. And if there should be anything worse than unpleasantness, she should even then complain of it in such a way as not to irritate the man. If she guides her conduct on principles such as these, even her very words, her very demeanour, may in all probability increase his sympathy and consideration for her. One's self-denial and the restraint which one imposes upon one's self, often depend on the way in which another behaves to us. The woman who is too indifferent and too forgiving is also inconsiderate. Remember, 'The unmoored boat floats about.' Is it not so."

To-no-Chiūjō quickly nodded assent, as he said:—"Quite true! A woman who has no strength of emotion, no passion of sorrow or of joy, can never be a holder of us. Nay, even jealousy, if not carried to the extent of undue suspicion, is not undesirable. If we ourselves are not in fault, and leave the matter alone, such jealousy may easily be kept within due bounds. But stop," added he suddenly; "some women have to bear, and do bear, every grief that they may encounter, with unmurmuring and suffering patience."

So said Tō no-Chiūjiō, who implied by this allusion that his sister was a woman so circumstanced. But Genji was still dozing, and no remark came from his lips.

Mediæval Literature.

(1200-1600 A. D.)

From the twelfth century to the rise of the Tokugawa Shōgunate in the seventeenth century, the empire passed through its Middle or "Dark." Age. During these five centuries, although numerous writings for political and religious purposes appeared, but little work of importance for the history of Japanese literature was produced. Some collections of verse may be excepted from this judgment. Two bits of prose writing, the "Hōjōki" (1212?) of Chomei and the "Tsure-zure gusa" (1345?) of Yoshida Kenkō have qualities that make them especially noteworthy. The "Hōjōki,"—the meditations of a hermit priest in a mountain hut, written near the beginning of the thirteenth century,—simple, fluent, vivacious, and yet forcible in style,—are esteemed as preserving for the language an excellence like that of the "Makura no Sōshi." And the "Tsure-zure gusa,' or "Weeds of Idleness," short essays composed in the fourteenth century, is the last notable example of the form and speech that gave to the classic age its commanding position in the development of pure Japanese literature. The "Weeds of Idleness," moreover, has the distinction of opening the way for the literary speech that came into full development in the seventeenth century, and has since been the language of the literature of Japan. In these essays, Chinese words were set into Japanese forms of speech without doing violence to Japanese modes of expression. The "Tsure-zure gusa" has thereby the double merit of embodying the highest literary excellence of a past age, and the beginning of a new linguistic development.

Further, the mediæval centuries are of importance to the literature of Japan from the development in them of a form of musical drama called the Nō no Utai originating in the ancient sacred dances and temple amusements cared for by the priests,—the only men of letters of the time. These lyric plays are dateless and anonymous, but they have considerable literary worth. Accompanying the severer sacred drama and serving as interludes for them, many comedies, kyōgen, written in the ordinary colloquial of the day, were produced. These comic writings possess small literary but much linguistic value.

Illustrative Translations.

Meditations of a Hermit.

[From the "Hōjōki," 1212, translated by J. M. Dixon. The writer, Kamo no Chomei, the son of a priest, disappointed with life, sought seclusion from the world in a ten-feet-square hut (hōjō), on Mt. Ohara. There he made a record of his thoughts, this "Hōjōki," now valued as a literary treasure.]

The water incessantly changes as the stream glides calmly on; the spray that hangs over a cataract appears for a moment only to vanish away. Such is the fate of mankind on this earth and of the houses in which they dwell. If we gaze at a mighty town we behold a succession of walls, surmounted by tiled roofs which vie with one another in loftiness. These have been from generation to generation the abodes of the rich and of the poor, and yet none resist the destructive influence of time. Some are allowed to fall into decay; others are replaced by new structures. Their fate is shared by their inmates. If after the lapse of a long period we return to a familiar locality, we scarcely recognize one in ten of the faces we were accustomed to meet long ago. In the morning we behold the light, and next evening we depart for our long home. Our destiny resembles the foam on the water. Whence came we, and whither are we tending? What things vex us, what things delight us, in this world of unreality? It is impossible truly to say. A house and its occupant, changing perpetually, may well be compared to a morning-glory flecked with dew. Sometimes it happens that the dew evaporates and leaves the flower to die in the first glare of day; sometimes the dew survives the flower, but only for a few hours; before sunset the dew also has disappeared.

Vagrant Reveries.

[From "Tsure-zure Gusa," 1345; translated by C. S. Eby. Yoshida Kenkō, the writer of these "Weeds of Idleness," was a court official, who upon the death of the Mikado entered the priesthood and became a monk. He was poet as well as prose writer; was also a profound student of philosophy and of the Chinese classics.]

If man did not disappear like the dew of the field, or vanish like the mists of Toribe hills, and continued his stay upon earth, then tenderness of heart, sympathy, pity, would perish. The unsettled changeableness of the present sublunary life is vastly to be preferred.

Of all living creatures man is the most long-lived. The ephemeral gnat comes into existence in the morning, and vanishes ere evening falls. The summer cicada knows never a spring or autumn. One year of a man's life in comparison with these things must be considered laborious and long. A life of a thousand years, if passed in discontent and clung to, would seem to fly away as a dream of the night. What profit is there in clinging to a life which results in deformity, and cannot after all continue forever? Longevity produces shame and disgrace. It is better to die before forty years are passed, and thus escape the shame of decrepitude.

A quiet talk with one perfectly of your own turn of mind is a very pleasant thing. It would give one great delight to speak freely with such a friend about things that are pleasant, and about the instability of earthly joys. But no such friendship is possible.

The changes of the seasons are full of things which arouse our souls to deep emotion.

To sit opposite to and converse with a man like oneself in every respect would be as good as sitting by oneself. Two persons in many respects alike could sometimes raise a dispute. And that would be very useful in dissipating the gloomy thoughts of solitude.

To spread open your books under the light of your lamp, and hold communion with men of bygone ages, is surpassingly comfortable.

Japanese poetry is especially charming. Even the toil of an awkward peasant or of a woodman, expressed in poetic form, delights the mind. The name of the terrible wild boar also, when styled 'fusui no toko," sounds elegant:

Every one says that the autumn is the most affecting season of the year. Perhaps so. But the springtime transformations of nature are more delightful, giving buoyancy to the heart. The warbling of cheery songsters gives signal for the full outburst of spring-tide glory. The wild grass sprouts under the hedge in answer to the mild rays of the kindly sun. The spring advances and the mists melt into translucent air. The flowers seem ready to burst into bloom. But rain and wind still make their reckless attacks, and flowers are shattered to our dismay. The changefulness of the days before the leaves are all green cause us much distress. The past is brought back to our loving memories more by the fragrance of the plum than by the hana tachibana,* which is noted in this respect. The pure appearance of the yamabuki† and the uncertain condition of the fuji‡ cannot be missed without pain.

The heart of man has been compared to flowers; but unlike them, it does not wait for the blowing of the wind to be scattered abroad. It is so fleeting and changeful.

* A small orange flower. † A kind of yellow wild rose. ‡ Wistaria.

THE DANCE OF THE MOON FAIRY.

[The beautiful translation by B. H. Chamberlain, of the second and third parts of the lyric drama "Hagoromo" (Robe of Feathers), is an excellent illustration of the mediæval Nō no Utai. These dramas bear a striking resemblance to the drama of ancient Greece. In this Hagoromo, a fisherman finds on a tree on Mio beach a feather robe. The robe is claimed by a lovely maiden, a moon fairy, who regains possession of her treasure by showing to the fisherman one of the dances of the immortals.]

Chorus—Where'er we gaze the circling mists are twining:
Perchance e'er now the moon her tendrils fair
Celestial blossoms bear.
Those flowerets tell us that the spring is shining—
Those fresh-blown flowerets in the maiden's hair.

Fairy— Blest hour beyond compare!

Chorus—Heaven hath its joys, but there is beauty here
Blow, blow, ye winds! that the white cloud-belts driven
Around my path may bar my homeward way;
Not yet would I return to heaven,
But here on Mio's pine-clad shore I'd stray,
Or where the moon in bright unclouded glory
Shines on Kiyomi's lea,
And where on Fujiyama's summit hoary
The snows look on the sea,
While breaks the morning merrily!
But of these three, beyond compare
The wave-washed shore of Mio is most fair,
When through the pines the breath of spring is playing.
What barrier rises 'twixt the heaven and earth?
Here too on earth the immortal gods came straying,
And gave our monarchs birth.

Fairy— Who in this empire of the rising sun,
While myriad ages run,
Shall ever rule their bright dominions,

Chorus— E'en when the feathery shock
Of fairies flitting past with silvery pinions
Shall wear away the granite rock!
Oh magic strains that fill our ravished ears!
The fairy sings, and from the cloudy spheres
Chiming in unison, the angels' lutes,
Tablets and cymbals and sweet silvery flutes,
Ring through the heaven that glows with purple hues,
As when Sumēru's western slope endues
The tints of sunset, while the azure wave
From isle to isle the pine-clad shores doth lave.
From Ukishima's slope,—a beauteous storm,—
Whirl down the flowers; and still that magic form,
Those snowy pinions, fluttering in the light,
Ravish our souls with wonder and delight.

Fairy— Hail to the kings that o'er the moon hold sway!
Heaven is their home, and Buddhas too are they.

Chorus—The fairy robes the maiden's limbs endue

Fairy— Are, like the very heavens, of tender blue;

Chorus—Or, like the mists of spring, all silvery white,

Fairy— Fragrant and fair—too fair for mortal sight!

Chorus—Dance on, sweet maiden, through the happy hours!
Dance on, sweet maiden, while the magic flowers
Crowning thy tresses flutter in the wind
Raised by the waving pinions intertwined!
Dance on! for ne'er to mortal dance 'tis given
To vie with that sweet dance thou bring'st from heaven:
And when, cloud-soaring, thou shalt all too soon
Homeward return to the full-shining moon,
Then hear our prayers, and from thy bounteous hand
Pour sevenfold treasures on our happy land;
Bless every coast, refresh each fainting field,
That earth may still her proper increase yield!
But ah! the hour, the hour of parting rings!
Caught by the breeze, the fairy's magic wings
Heavenward do bear her from the pine-clad shore,
Past Ashidaka's heights, and where are spread
The eternal snows on Fujiyama's head,—
Higher and higher to the azure skies,
Till wandering vapours hide her from our eyes!

THE TRUE SAMURAI.

[This illustration of the spirit of the true samurai is taken from a mediæval drama entitled "Dwarf Trees," translated by "Shinchi." The drama tells of the award made to a poverty-stricken knight by the de facto ruler of Japan, 1190, for great kindness shown to the latter when once abroad in the garb of a mendicant priest. The samurai had sacrificed even his dwarf trees to warm his mean-looking guest.]

Tsuneyo—Hail, traveller! Is it true that the troops are gathering towards Kamakura?* Why do such immense numbers now advance to the capital? [Following in the train.] Why, here are all the barons and knights of the eight provinces of Adzuma in splendid equipment, all aiming for Kamakura! Their weapons are brilliantly flashing, their armour resplendent with silver and gold, mounted on well-fattened horses, with numerous steeds for relief in the train. Amid them all this poor Tsuneyo cuts a sorry figure, with horse and weapons and all so mean on this rough road. Doubtless they will laugh at me, though my soul is by no means interior. Still this lean, slow horse renders the heart's courage abortive.

Chorus—Though he hastens, hastens, as a quivering willow twig he is so weak, so very weak. Though he twist and pull, the horse is ill-fed; though he beat him and whack his flanks, yet he can scarcely make him budge. There is no better conveyance for him; but he eventually comes in last of all with weary weakly feet.

Saimiōji [in state in Kamakura]—Is my attendant there?

Attendant—At your service, my lord.

Saimiōji—Have the troops arrived from all the provinces?

Attendant—All have safely come.

Saimiōji—Among the troops is a single retainer in ragged armour, with rusty spear, and leading himself a starved steed. Go find him and order him into my presence.

Attendant—Your orders shall be executed. [Goes out.] Any one there?

Servant—At your service, sir.

Attendant—My lord's orders are that we go out immediately, and find among the troops a samurai in battered armour, with rusty spear, leading a lean horse, and bring him at once into his august presence.

Servant—I will attend to the matter. [Goes out and hails Tsuneyo.] Hail! Art thou my man?

Tsuneyo—Why am I called?

Servant—Haste there; come into the presence of our Lord Saimiōji.

Tsuneyo—And am I called in appear in his august presence?

Servant—Most assuredly.

Tsuneyo—Alack, but this is unexpected! You must have mistaken your man.

Servant—Not at all: you are the man intended. The way of it is this: my lord has ordered into his presence the worst looking samurai of all the assembled armies; I have looked well over the hosts, and am sure that there is none that can compare with you for hideous appearance. So it is settled. Come, haste to the palace.

Tsuneyo—What do you say? He wants the worst-looking samurai in the army!

Servant—Most positively; those are the orders.

Tsuneyo—Then I must be the man. Go; say I'm coming.

Servant—Very well.

Tsuneyo [approaching the palace]—Verily, this is incomprehensible. Some enemy has accused me of treason, and this being ordered into my lord's presence is but the prelude of having my head taken off. Well, I can do nothing to help it. I will go in at any risk; please show me the way.

Chorus—Then in an instant, suddenly ushered into the midst of assembled soldiers ranged like blazing stars, rank on rank of samurai of the armies, besides many other notables. Their eyes are drawn to him, and many point the scornful finger.

Tsuneyo—What is well sewed may yet be ripped.

Chorus—His old armour and rusty spear are not useless to him, nor cares he for the ridiculous figure he cuts.

[He appears before Saimiōji.]

Saimiōji—Ha! That is the man. [To Tsuneyo.] Art thou Genzaemon Tsuneyo of Sano, and hast thou forgotten the wandering priest who sought shelter of thee yon snowy night? Thou declaredst then that should trouble arise at Kamakura thou wouldst don thy battered armour, seize thy rusty spear, mount thy shadowy steed, and speed thee first of all to Kamakura. Now thou hast valiantly kept thy word; for this I admire thee. [To the assembly] The object of this gathering of vassals in the capital was for no other cause than to test the truth or falsehood of Tsuneyo's words. However, if there is any person here with a grievance to state, let him now plead his cause, and judgment shall be given according to justice and law. But first of all I give judgment in the case of Tsuneyo. His former inheritance in Sano, over thirty counties, must be forthwith returned in him. Moreover, besides this, for that in the cold snowstorm he willingly cut down his precious ornamental trees to warm the stranger guest, in hope of reward in some other world, I now in return for the ume [plum], sakura [cherry], matsu [pine] trees, bestow upon him Ume-da in Kaga, Sakura-i in Etchu, and Matsu-eda in Kōdzuke, three portions as a perpetual inheritance for himself and his heirs to all generations; in testimony whereof I now give official documents signed and sealed.

Chorus—With gladness of heart he accepts the benefactions of his lord.

Tsuneyo—Tsuneyo accepts the gifts.

Chorus—He accepts, and three times makes humble obeisance. O ye who erst laughed him to scorn, look now upon him excelling in honour. The warriors all return to their homes, and among them Tsuneyo, his face all bright with new-found joy. Now riding bravely on a gorgeous steed, away he speeds to his home in Sano of Kamakura with joyous heart.

THE DOMINANT NOTE OF THE LAW.

[This is one of the Buddhist "Wasan," or hymns, from the latter part of the sixteenth (?) century, written by a priest, Kwaihan; translation by the present writer. The translation follows the Japanese metre of the naga uta, with an anapestic cadence, each line containing two series of alternating five and seven syllable measures. Each line of the Japanese original begins with one of the syllables, in their regular order, of the I-ro-ha syllabary, which itself is a song embodying the thought that is the burden of this poem.]

In spending my days chasing things that are trifles,
In sowing the seed of the sixfold migration, *
I pass through the world with my life-purpose baffled.
Since gaining a birth among those that are human,
Just now I have learned that I may become godlike;
So now I seek Buddha's help, trusting the promise.
This world, after all,—it is only a dream-world;
And we, after all, are vain selves with dust mingled.
Our jealousies, angers, and scoffing reproaches
All evils we do, though disguised by our cunning,
At last become massed like the bulk of a mountain,
And we are cast down to "The River of Three Paths"; †
A fitting reward for our self-prompted actions,
Whose ills each must bear, never blaming another.
Live I a long life,—'tis like flashing of lightning.
Live I but one life,—lo! 'tis lived in a dream-world.
Grow I into one life with wife and with children,
The love of such one life abides but a moment.
Think, how to the depths has my heart been affected!
Engrossed by my bonds to a world that is fleeting.
Naught led me to pray,—"Namu Amida Buddha;" ‡
As wind to a horse-ear were things of the future;
Reminded of death's blast, I answered, "When comes it?"
The preacher I trusted not; thought he spoke falsely:
And so has my time sped to this very moment.
Desire I thought was for good that would follow;—
Oh! how I lament as I think of what has been.
But yet in this troubled life comes consolation:
Adorable Buddha enlightens the dark way;
Has pity on all those who live in these last days;
To all gives compassion and blessed redemption,
Whose depth or whose height passes ocean or mountain.
To Buddha's salvation so bountiful, boundless,
Thanksgiving forever;—to me it is given.
Up pointing towards heaven, down pointing 'neath heaven, §
The Buddha sheds light upon all who are living.
Now, knowing the Law as the Law has been given,
The blest triple treasure,—Rite, Priesthood, and Buddha, ¶—
I lift up my song, though I sing in a dream-world,
If sorrow and knowing are both the mind's flowering,
If demon or Buddha with each is attendant,
Then let all my faith upon knowing be centred.
Up striving away from "The River of Three Paths,"
A glance at the Fullness Divine of all Goodness
Will gladden my eyes,—the reward of my striving.
Recite then the Prayer;—for by its mere virtue
Your pathway will enter the "Land of the Holy."

FORMOSA.

Professor W. K. Burton writes as follows from Taihoku (Taipeh):—

We are doing fairly well as regards improvements here, in the north. I have been unable to see any other part of the country, for I have spent the whole of the time since mid-summer here, except for a day or two now and then, in the hospital—a most excellent, and well built and well organized hospital, but only one storey high and situated in the middle of a great swamp! And this in perhaps the most malarial place in the world. I do not know who is responsible for the site. I fear it was Dr. Goto, who was here before I came for the first time.

I have been down with "Formosan fever" which is bad, with acute inflammatory rheumatism which is worse, and with dysentry, which is worst of all. Of 12 of us who were attacked with dysentry in the hospital at the same time, I am the only one alive.

This city (intramural) is likely to become a model city. It is difficult to imagine it the same place that I first saw nearly three years ago, when, in spite of wide principal streets, it was squalid and filthy, the main thoroughfares used as markets for all kinds of indescribable and stinking abominations, the side walks (covered) unusable for their proper purpose as every shop-keeper displayed his goods on the part of the pavement forming the frontage of his shop. The eternal shouting and screeching and chattering of Chinese as they tried to make bargains was quite awful.

Now it is a decent, clean, Japanese town. The Chinese, except for coolies, mostly jinriki-shamen, have simply gone. It is difficult to say why, for no pressure was put on them. Perhaps it was because they were offered very good prices for their property; perhaps, because they resented the regulations about markets in the street, and the monopoly of the side walks (a remarkably good site being given them for a market place just outside the walls); perhaps because of strict vetoes against throwing garbage indiscriminately into the streets &c., &c.; perhaps, because they could not exist away from what seems their natural pigginess. By the way, all pigs get the order of the sack! They have, for the most part, withdrawn themselves to Banka (or Manka), now a suburb which might well be called the "Old Town," as it existed under the name Banka, or Manka, long before Taipeh became the capital. Of all the many Chinese towns I have seen it is about the most squalid and filthy. The Japanese have been tinkering at it, but with little effect, and I think I gave good advice three years ago when I said that it was hopeless; that there was nothing to be done but to destroy it, compensating the proprietors (as has been done in Hongkong, in places) and then looking to do something in the way of establishing a "New Banka."

In the city there are several imposing, if not very beautiful buildings, notably the Post Office (which would—or should—make that of Tokyo blush with shame), the meteorological observatory and the hospital—albeit it is only one story high. There is an efficient sewerage system constructed on scientific principles. If Dr. Goto can carry out his loan scheme, next year will see the beginning of a splendid modern water supply system. Streets are being made that would shame Tokyo—though that is saying mighty little. We have a road-roller. It is a legacy from the Chinese. It had been bought, I presume, for the sake of a "squeeze" that some official could make, for I understand that through several years never once did "the wheels go round." When I discovered it, it appeared to be in a pitiably hopeless condition, half buried in the ground. I was surprised, however, to find on examination that no organic disease could be diagnosed, so we got her out of the mud and had her repaired, and now she marches up and down the street proudly accompanied and followed by a vast shouting rubble, mostly children.

Macadam is well enough known here, though Telford is not despised. The streets are being made of broken stones gradnated over a stratum of shingle, no gravel being used except as top-dressing—a mere sprinkling of very small stuff. I think this will turn out model streets, but of course it will take a year or two to know.

At Kelung, water works are nearly completed. At Tamsui water-works were half finished last year, but have "stuck" on account of lack of skilled labour, all that we have being concentrated on Kelung. It is terribly difficult to get skilled labour here, even when offering long contracts and wages which, according to Japanese standards, must be considered extravagant.

What I have said is all about the North. Of the South I hear ugly rumours. I do not believe, however, that things are so bad as some newspapers would make them out to be, for I trace, as the originator, or at least the prompter, the same individual who wrote the absurd "atrocity" letters some three years ago. A trader who has been half-ruined by the coming of the Japanese is naturally bitter against them, and there is no doubt that the old traders (foreign) have been treated very badly indeed in the matter of camphor. One of the principal houses in the Island is about to close, because the embargoes laid on obtaining and exporting camphor, have made trade in camphor impossible or unremunerative.

I think that when I get out of this place I shall write an article—for a magazine, or some other kind of publication—on "Life in a Japanese Hospital." It has been a great experience to me, and has brought me a good deal nearer to the solution of the apparently indeterminate problem as to the true inner nature of the Japanese. The faithful steadfastness to duty of all here—the Doctors and the nurses—the latter perhaps more than any—is simply sublime; I can use no less forcible word.

"YOKOHAMA" LODGE INSTALLATION.

The annual installation meeting of the Yokohama Lodge, No. 1092, E.C., was held at the Masonic Temple on Wednesday evening. Nearly seventy Masons were present, including some 26 Past Masters, and Lodges represented by visitors were scattered as wide apart as Nova Scotia and Bombay. The Ceremony of Installation was carried out by the District Grand Master of Japan, Rt. Wor. Bro. W. H. Stone, and after the Worshipful Master, Bro. Vivian R. Bowden, had been placed in the Chair, he invested his officers as follows:—

A. Woolley	I. P. M.
H. J. Sharp, P.M.	S. W.
F. J. Lias	J. W.
E. C. Fox	Treas.
Rev. E. C. Irwine, P.M.	Sec.
H. A. Ahrens	S. D.
G. Schneider	J. D.
L. Ph. von Hemert	D. of C.
P. Launay	I. G.
G. Delbourgo	Tyler.

About sixty of the Brethren sat down to dinner with Wor. Bro. Bowden. The loyal and other toasts of obligation were given from the Chair, after which Bro. the Rev. E. C. Irwine proposed the toast of the Officers of the District Grand Lodge, in the course of which he pointed out the great moral influence for good that could and should be exerted by Masonry in Japan, as elsewhere in the world. Wor. Bro.

Alfred Woolley, D.G.S.W., responded. After some music by Bro. W. K. Vincent, Wor. Bro. Woolley proposed the toast of the newly installed Worshipful Master and his officers. In Bro. Bowden, the Lodge honoured a good man and a worthy Mason, who, during his short stay in Japan, had shown the true metal that was in him. He prophesied a successful year for the new Master and his Lodge. Suitable replies were made by the Wor. Master and Wor. Bro. Sharp. The toast of "The Sister Constitutions and Visitors" was submitted in graceful terms by Wor. Bro. E. Flint Kilby, who, after alluding to the strong fraternal bonds that knitted together the Brethren in the various Lodges of Yokohama and Tokyo, and to the sympathetic reception that awaited Masonic visitors to Japan, expressed a hope that the coming year would see a revival of interest in the Craft by the older members who had been active in the years gone by. Wor. Bro. A. R. G. Clark (Star the East, 640. S.C.), Wor. Bro. A. Bellamy Brown (O'Tentosama, 1263 E.C.), Wo . Bro. James (Tokyo, E.C.), Wor. Bro. Gowey (Tacoma), Bro. R. G. E. Forster (Nagasaki), and Wor. Bro. W. Gordon replied. Wor. Bro. H. W. Lea toasted the Immediate Past Master and Retiring Officers of the Lodge in felicitous terms, and the I.P.M. briefly replied. Other toasts included "Our Seafaring Brethren" (Bro. E. C. Fox), "Mothers, Wives, Daughters, and Sisters of Masons" (Bro. F. J. Lias), and "The Tyler's Toast." During the evening songs were contributed by various Brethren, a very enjoyable time being spent.

THE F. C. AND A. C. BALL.

(COMMUNICATED.)

It seems a pity that the Y.C. and A.C. public subscription ball should be allowed to pass with only a line recording the fact that it took place, especially when it was such a conspicuous success both from a social and a dancing point of view, reflecting great credit on the committee. Everybody who cares for such functions was p esent, which means a sufficiency of dancers to keep the floor full of life and gaiety from first to last, and those who were not there have every reason for regret.

The decorations were light but effective: and of course, appropriate; emblems of sport being everywhere in evidence, from the cricket net arranged on the stage as if for practice, and tennis nets draped along the side-walls, with bats wickets, baseball clubs, hocky sticks etc., at intervals, to the picture from the latest Christmas number of the Illustrated London News of "the Captain of the Eleven." The flags of Great Britain and America flanked either side of the stage, and lines of bright-coloured flags crossed each other from corner to corner of the ceiling with good effect. In fact, the Hall never presented a more attractive appearance and being less crowded than on the occasion of St. Andrew's Ball, the ladies' dresses—of which quite a number were deserving of special mention—showed off to better advantage. At 11.30 an excellent supper was served, and, when the stage curtain rose, revealing several blazing Old English plum puddings decked with holly, thrills of recollection arose in many breasts of the days of long ago! And who among the gay company did not think, also, of "the Old Folks at Home"! The searching of the puddings for the ring, thimble, and bachelor button gave rise to lots of amusement; and an innovation for such parties here, but a seasonable and happy one, viz. crackers, added greatly to the fun and laughter. After supper dancing was kept up with unusual spirit until 2 o'clock, when a large circle joined hands and sang "God save the Queen," and "Auld Lang Syne," thus bringing a most enjoyable ball to an end. On all sides were heard hopes that the dance would become an annual affair, and many a good wish was expressed for the continued prosperity of the Y. C. & A.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FIRE ON BOARD THE "KAIMON KAN."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—The "imaginary fire on board H.I.M.S. Kaimon" in your paper of the 18th ult., was not altogether imaginary. The Hainan, one of the Douglas S.S. Co.'s steamers, on her voyage from Tamsui to Amoy, caught fire on the 26th October last, and it was extinguished with the loss of some lives. As a curious coincidence would have it, the Chinese characters of the ship's name, though different in pronunciation, are exactly the same as those of the Japanese vessel Kaimon.

Some Japanese papers, therefore, must have mistaken her for the warship.

Apologizing for the fact that this bit of news from a corner of Taiwan may be "behind time" when it reaches you

I am, yours very truly,

A YOUNG JAPANESE.

Tainan, Formosa, Dec. 6th, 1898.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Mr. C. M. Birnie has been installed R.W.M. of the Nagasaki Lodge, No. 710, S.C.

The Bishop of London announces that he has paid the amount of Mr. Hooley's gift to St. Paul's to the Official Receiver.

Sport says that in 1900 an Indian Eleven will visit England to compete with first-class teams. Mr. J. M. Framji Patel has already approached the leading Parsees and native cricketers.

The introduction of a system of electric tramways in Colombo will shortly be an accomplished fact. The lines and powerhouse are approaching completion. The length of the lines will be about three-and-a-half miles.

The daughter of Mr. J. F. Carnegy, who is in charge of the Pauper Hospital, Penang, was burned to death on the 27th ult. her clothes being set on fire while lighting a match. The little girl was only seven years old.

Mr. Justice Hawkins, who has just retired, is 81 years of age and has been a Judge of the Queen's Bench Division since Nov., 1876. He is one of England's grand old men, for his intellectual vigour, like his bodily powers, is said to be in no way abated by the frosts of his great age.

At Singapore on the 3rd inst., Messrs. McAlister and Co. held an auction sale of the wreck of the British sailing ship Earl of Hopetoun, as she now lies in the vicinity of Alceste reef, Gaspar Straits. The vessel was knocked down for $210, and the cargo for $370, to Cheng Toon & Co. on behalf of a Batavia Chinaman.

The action for defamation of character brought against a Mr. Allison by Messrs. Donaldson and Burkinshaw, acting on behalf of the Rajah of Sarawak, again occupied the attention of Mr. Elgam in the Senior Magistrate's Court at Singapore on the 3rd December, having been adjourned from 5th November. The alleged defamatory statements were contained in a book entitled "The Real Pirates of Borneo." The Magistrate said there was no doubt that the whole tone of the book was distinctly libellous on the Rajah of Sarawak as well as on other people. The only thing that could be said in defendant's favour was that no one who read the book could fail to come to the conclusion that the writer was scarcely responsible for his actions and writings. He had not been officially certified to be irresponsible, and he must therefore be held to be liable. A fine of £100 or one month's imprisonment was inflicted. Notice of appeal was given.

CHINESE NEWS.

Colonel de Souza, who was shot by a member of the Macao garrison, died on the 1st.

With reference to Mr. Pritchard Morgan's reported "concession of mining rights in Szechuan," the N. C. Daily News understands that the original report regarding them was not quite accurately worded. The mineral rights in Szechuan have actually been granted to an influential Chinese syndicate, which finds a large portion of the necessary capital, and has called in Mr. Pritchard Morgan to assist it both financially and technically. Meanwhile, the French Minister at Peking has already entered a protest against the grant in question. Referring to the matter two days later, our contemporary said:—

We have had an opportunity of perusing the contract entered into by Mr. Pritchard Morgan with reference to the mineral deposits in the province of Szechuan, and we have before us the agreement between the English and French Governments signed by Lord Salisbury and Baron de Courcel in 1896, by which the privileges acquired by either nation in Yunnan and Szechuan are to be extended and rendered common to both Powers and their nationals. This agreement is what is relied upon by the French in their alleged protests; but the contract before us is one between Chinese acting under the direct decree of the Emperor and a British subject, whereby the latter co-operates with the Chinese in the development of the mines of Szechuan for the benefit of the Chinese Government; and after the province has been geologically surveyed and the regulations perfected, the mines will be open for selection by all nationalities alike. We are sure that when the French understand this they will not stand in the way of the development of the resources of China for the general benefit of all.

The Emperor of China is reported to be in perfect health. He speaks little but smiles at times.

The Prince of Yü, whose father died only about six weeks ago, has now had to suffer a financial loss through the burning of his Palace at Peking. The conflagration began at about 3 o'clock on the afternoon of the 27th ultimo and over thirty rooms were destroyed before the fire could be put out. The losses in furniture, etc., are roughly estimated at something over Tls. 40,000, but some very ancient jade, gold, and bronze works of art of priceless value to Chinese connoisseurs are missing, which makes this fire a serious disaster to the young Prince of Yü.

It may not perhaps be known, remarks a Shanghai contemporary, that there are now, or in process of erection, no less than seven factories for the making of smokeless powder in China, viz:—Wuchang, Nanking, Shanghai, Soochow, Haugchow, Canton, and Foochow. It is officially estimated that by the summer of 1899 these factories will be able to turn out about 50,000 catties of smokeless powder per month, and that at the present date of writing the government has ready for immediate use over two million smokeless powder cartridges, one half of which were imported from Europe.

The Yellow River, in its last overflow, inundated thirty-four counties, covering an estimated area of 2,600 square miles.

The Peking and Tientsin Times of the 3rd inst. says of the audience offered by the Empress Dowager to the wives of the Foreign Representatives at Peking:—"There are many other minor difficulties which, although of vital importance to those concerned, are utterly beneath notice in a public sense, but which convey the impression nevertheless that the real object and significance of the audience is being mistaken. In spite of the indignant disgust at any political significance being attached to it which is displayed in some quarters, the audience remains distinctly a political event, inasmuch as it represents the breaking down of yet one more 'never been before' in China's history, and the creation of a precedent which may have and might have a modicum of importance in China's social future. It foreshadows—remotely perhaps, but emphatically—the breaking down of social barriers for women in China and suggests embryonic possibilities for the elevation of women's status in China. It is something that has never been before, and which would probably have been deemed utterly impossible a few years ago; something which represents another hoist out of China's time-honoured ruts, and as such is an important political event. If argument denies it this distinction, we fail to understand in what other light the matter can be regarded, and we certainly conclude from the extreme care being taken in the arrangement of all details, that it is thus viewed in Peking."

Mr. E. H. Lavera, one of the founders and for a long time Chairman of the North China Insurance Company, died at Shanghai on Dec. 12, in his 62nd year.

The following incident, as the N.-C. Daily News justly remarks, is surely a record in its class:—In 1864 a Manila watchman named Bugas employed by Messrs. Nicolson & Boyd was allowed sick leave, and Mr. Boyd told him to return when he felt better. On the 12th of December 1898, Bargas called ■ the office of Messrs. Boyd & Co., Lt., to see Mr. P. V. Grant who could identify him, and to report that as he was now quite restored to health, he was anxious to be reinstated in the post he occupied thirty-four years ago!

Lord Charles Beresford had three long and important interviews with the Viceroy Chang Chih-tung ■ Wuchang. At Wuhu on his way down river Lord Charles accepted the invitation of the Viceroy Liu to take passage in the cruiser Nanshu, which promptly ran aground, the river being very low. She quickly got off, however. When his lordship arrived at Nanking, the Viceroy gave him a grand and most cordial reception, such an one ■ would be given to a Prince of the reigning dynasty were one to visit Nanking.

The latest news regarding Yü Man-tze that appears in Shanghai papers, is contained in two telegrams. The first is dated Chungking, Dec. 9th, and says:—

Owing to the continued refusal of Yü Man-tze to hand over Father Fleury to the mandarins, Jêu Tai-tai of this city has petitioned Viceroy Kuei to give orders to the troops to begin active operations against the rebels at once. The troops have hitherto been kept inactive owing to the threat of Yü to behead Father Fleury the moment a gun is fired by the troops against the rebels. The rebellion is spreading.

Three days later the following appeared:—

The Chinese General Chou has been captured by Yü Man-tze. There is reason to believe that force will be used to suppress the brigands, but it is not safe to rely upon the troops.

MOSQUITO YACHT CLUB.

The annual meeting of this Club was held at Keil's Building on Tuesday evening, Mr. V. Blad presiding over a small attendance.

REPORT AND ACCOUNTS.

The report and accounts were as follows:—

Your Committee have the pleasure to submit this, the Third Annual Report of the Mosquito Yacht Club, and to chronicle a successful season, with a satisfactory increase in the number of members.

RACING.—The year under review brought no new additions to the Fleet, and, bearing this fact in mind, in drawing up the Race Fixtures for July and onwards, the Committee decided to make Races for presented prizes only. The racing was keenly contested between the Nandeska, Sodeska, and Kodesu, and the Committee would like to see more boats of the same type in the water.

The thanks of the Club are due to those who so kindly contributed prizes to be sailed for, and in particular, to those absent members who sent us the "Exiles Cup" from Hongkong: a detailed list is as follows:—

The "Sodeska Cup"...won by	Nandeska.
The "Commodore's Cup"	" Sodeska.
The "Sayonara Cup."	" Kodesu
The "O.P.H." Cups.	" Sodeska and Nandeska.
The Simplex Stockless Anchor and Campbell bitts.....	" Kodesu.
The "Kodesu Cup"...	" Nandeska.
The "Exiles Cup" ...	" Nandeska.
The "Committee Cup"	" Nandeska.

Aborigine was completed at a cost considerably in excess of the original estimate; the Committee have to thank members for the generous support accorded to them, whereby they have been enabled to liquidate all outstanding liabilities, with the exception of Yen 167.63 due upon current account.

In view of the impracticability of effecting Insurance upon satisfactory terms, the Committee would suggest the advisability of setting aside the entrance Fees, or a proportion thereof, for a Sinking Fund, to meet extraordinary expenses in connection with the boat.

The Aborigine was launched in March, and has been much appreciated by members for bathing and cruising.

The Temple at Tomioka was rented for the summer months, and was well resorted to by members: the refusal of the Temple for next season has been secured.

With sincere wishes for the future success of the Club, your Committee beg to tender herewith their resignation.

V. BLAD, Commodore. F. J. HALL, Honorary Treasurer. S. WARMING, Vice-Commodore. P. S. BENT, Honorary Secretary. J. MCARTHUR.

E. & O. E.

F. J. HALL, Honorary Treasurer.

Yokohama, December 1st, 1898.

Checked and found correct,

A. R. OWEN.

The CHAIRMAN pointed out that the cost of the Aborigine was very heavy and in spite of liberal donations from all kinds of people, passive as well as active, they had not been able to wipe off the debt entirely. It was reduced to $167, and they hoped to get up some entertainment to clear off the balance. He might suggest that it would be a good thing to recommend to the incoming Committee the formation of a sinking fund for the Aborigine in order that if anything happened to her it should not be a total loss.

In answer to a member, the CHAIRMAN and Mr. F. J. HALL pointed out that the 2,500 yen set down as the value of the Aborigine was what the Committee considered it was worth ■ the Committee. Mr. HALL was confident that they could not replace the boat for that sum.

The report and accounts were passed, on the motion of Mr. SCHELLENBERG.

COMMITTEE AND OFFICERS.

The CHAIRMAN announced that he and Mr. Warming were going home, and therefore would be unable even if elected to act again as Commodore and Vice-Commodore. As the result of a ballot, Mr. MacArthur was elected Commodore and Mr. Hall Vice-Commodore.

Mr. Hyde Pearson and Mr. Mair were elected on the Committee. Mr. Schellenberg explained that he should not be able to act, as he was going home.

Mr. Owen was elected Hon. Secretary and Mr. Bishop Hon. Treasurer. Mr. Owen declined office at first on the ground of lack of time, but eventually after much pressing agreed to accept conditionally on his being at liberty to resign in case he found it impossible to continue the work.

THE TWO CLUBS.

The SECRETARY (Mr. P. S. Bent) read a correspondence which had passed between the Yokohama Yacht Club and himself. The first letter was received from the Secretary of the Yokohama Yacht Club (Mr. Rose) and suggested that it would be found advantageous to bring the boats of the two clubs together again as far as racing was concerned and suggesting that a Committee of each Club should meet to further this object. The reply of the Mosquito Club Committee was to the effect that the Committee could not see its way to the Committees coming together, but individual members would be encouraged to take part.

The CHAIRMAN mentioned that the matter was laid before racing members, and one boat, the Nandeska, joined the other Club and probably one more would be entered next year.

THANKS.

The Committee desired to give thanks to the subscribers and donors of prizes, and to the officers who had taken special interest in the building of the Aborigine. Votes of thanks to the Commodore and Vice-Commodore, and the owner of the Hall for the use of the room, were passed.

FIRE ON A SAILING SHIP.

NAVAL BOARD OF INQUIRY.

A Naval Court of Inquiry was held on Tuesday morning at H.B.M's Consulate, Yokohama, the object of investigation being the recent fire on board the sailing ship Troop, of Liverpool (Master, ■. J. Fitz) on December 14th. The Court was composed of Mr. H. A. C. Bonar, consul; Mr. Charles Douglas Bennett, Master of the P. and O. Shanghai; Mr. James Macfarlane, Master of the St. Mary's Bay, sailing ship; and Mr. Harring-

The Clerk read the report of the Master as to the fire, and his request for an enquiry. He also read the entry in the official log book which declared his belief that the ship was wilfully set on fire.

Mr. Bonar—Is there any one interested who wishes to become a party to the proceeding?

The Master—Yes, sir.

Witnesses were ordered out of Court.

Edwin James Fritz was called. He said he was not on board the ship at the time of the fire. Witness was sleeping at the Imperial Hotel on the 13th, and on the morning of the 14th was notified by the Captain of the Frankenstein that the ship was on fire. This was about half-past six a.m. Witness got off as quickly as possible, and when he reached the ship the fire was smouldering, but it had ceased to burn. The men of war's crews were just leaving the ship, having done all that was possible. Mr. Laurence, captain of the ship John Currier, was on board, and witness saw him first. The mate afterwards made him a verbal report, and informed him that the fire had broken out at 5.30. It was not usual for witness to be out of the ship. Witness had been to a Masonic Lodge the previous evening, and it was blowing so hard that he could not get back on board the same night. Witness made a report as soon as he could to the Consulate. He made it on what he was told and what he saw. He did not make an entry in the official log at the time; he made the entry that morning (December 20th.) He did not think it was compulsory. He supposed the proper entry had been made in the ship's log at the time; he had made no effort to satisfy himself. The entry in the official log was dated the 14th, and was signed by himself and the mate that morning. The account of the fire was the mate's statement, witness added the particulars of the damage. It was apparent to the eye that there was much damage.

Mr. Bonar—How came you to say, under the date of December 14th, written on December 20th, that "no detailed account can be made until the cargo is out of that part of the ship?

Witness—It is not taken out yet.

Have you any means of saying what is the damage?—I don't know, it was due a great deal to water. I should be prepared to put in a surveyor's report later.

In answer to further questions, witness said his reasons for believing it was a case of incendiarism were based on what he had seen and heard, and from what he found out. He noticed that there had been two distinct fires on both sides of the ship. A kerosene tin found near the fire was brought to witness when he returned on board on the afternoon of the 14th. The chief officer called his attention to it. The first officer also brought him next morning a knife found near the fire.

Mr. Bonar—Is this statement in the log one which you would have made on the 14th or is it one based on what you have heard since?

Witness—I had the opinion in the first place, but I don't know whether I should have expressed it in writing except from what I have heard.

Mr. Bonar—Do you confirm on oath now everything you find in this logbook?

Witness—Yes.

Witness added that there had been no trouble with the crew before the day of the fire. He did not know whether any body had been on board besides the crew on the day before the fire. He could not see how the fire could be accidental, as the hatches were all closed on the day previous. One fire apparently commenced about twenty feet forward of the main hatch on the port side; the other was on the starboard side abreast of the main hatch. A man could get down into the hold by means of the air shaft as well as by the hatches. The boatswain Gorig, and two boys named Scott and Hansen, lived in the room near the air shaft. He could not see how the fire could have occurred unless some one lighted it. The crew had not been working cargo the day before, and so it would have had to smoulder for 48 hours before breaking out. That did not seem possible with such a cargo. Witness produced the kerosene tin found near the fire. When he first saw it he was shown a cut about four inches in length. Witness identified the knife produced. It belonged to the boatswain Gorig. He had fitted it into the cut in the tin, and it fitted the first hole made in the tin. Witness did not connect anyone in particular with the fire. No member of the crew had given any trouble during the voyage; he had every reason to be satisfied with their conduct. The cargo was originally 59,525 cases of oil, and at the time of the fire he had discharged 20,000. Witness could not say whether fire had been set to the ship or to the cargo. There were some sails which were burned. The Surveyor had said the previous day that the damage was probably about £600 or £700. Witness communicated with the owners then on the 15th. They had replied asking the extent of the damage, and he replied on the 19th stating it as nearly as he could.

This concluded the witness's evidence.

Mr. Bonar—The fact of your not having made an entry on the official log at the time and having made it such a long time after the occurrence shows very gross carelessness on your part. The Court has nothing to do with that at the present moment, but it may be the subject of another enquiry. If you are required you will be sent for.

Nelson Arnold Withers, chief officer, said about 5.30 a.m. on December 14th, he received the alarm of fire. He directed the seals to be removed from the hatches, called all hands, and hailed all the ships at hailing distance. He then went down the after hatch, but could not see anything. The smoke was so thick that he was almost suffocated, and he could hardly find his way back. By the time he got on deck a party had arrived on board from the John Currier, and a boat's crew from a Japanese man-of-war came aboard shortly after. It was found that there were two separate fires—one on the port side about 15 or 20 feet from the main hatch, and the other close to the hatch on the main side. After the smoke had cleared away they went down, and found sails on each side where the fires were. The one on the port side had got right through the 'tween decks and burned the tops of some of the cases below. The other fire had burned about half way through the 'tween decks. Witness's first impression was that it was not an accidental fire; that it was impossible that sparks from the galley could have reached the spots where the fires were. The fires were put out in about an hour or an hour and a half. Witness sent the steward ashore for the captain 15 or 20 minutes after the fire. The whole of the crew turned to, and worked to put the fire out. The sails were in the same position the day before as at the time of the fire. They were placed there to be repaired. A case was placed there for the repairer to sit on, and witness noticed two tins had been taken out of it when he went down after the fire. He imagined from the appearance of the sails that they had been soaked in oil. Witness made a report to the captain as soon as he came on board. Witness told him there and then that he thought the fire had been done intentionally. Witness told the captain afterwards that he suspected the boatswain Gorig. He thought so because he thought Gorig was the only man capable of doing of it, as he was uneasy in the ship, he was not competent, and was anxious to get out of her. He had heard that Gorig had said that he would get out of the ship in Yokohama and would get his wages too. Witness also heard that when the fire was reported the boatswain said, "Oh, it's happened through those old wet sails taking spontaneous combustion." Witness knew the sails were not wet. There was an air shaft which led to the hold near the boatswain's cabin, and if Gorig did not go down there himself he must have heard anybody who did go down. A boy named Scott showed witness the tin produced. The gash in it would not be broad enough for a sheath knife; he tried a sheath knife first. He then borrowed the boatswain's knife under pretence that he wanted to sharpen a pencil, and he found that the cut in the tin was one which the boatswain's knife would make. Other knives might make such a cut; witness had one himself. Witness told the Captain everything about his suspicions. He also told the boatswain he had lost the knife, and he appeared to be "awful anxious," about it.

By Mr. Bonar—The entry in the official log was signed by him that morning (20th). Witness had also made an entry in his logbook. He started it the night of the fire, and finished it next morning.

Mr. Bonar—You will produce that book this afternoon. Do you not know it is a rule to make an entry in the official log as soon as possible after an occurrence?

Witness—I didn't know it was necessary.

In answer to further questions, witness said he had forgotten whether he showed his entry to the captain, the captain might have seen it if he wished. He had never had a quarrel with the boatswain; he was on reasonably good terms with him.

The court adjourned till two o'clock.

Emil Gorig, boatswain of the ship, said he was on board the vessel on the morning of the 14th. He was awake about five o'clock, and heard someone coming forward. Witness jumped up, and went out but could see nothing. It was not light. He shortly after saw the mate and asked him what was the matter. He said, "There is fire in the ship." Witness asked him what part of the ship, and the reply was "Aft." Witness went back to his room, and called up the boys who slept there, and then went forward to the forecastle to call the crew. They covered up the ventilators to prevent any draught reaching the fire. They then opened the main hatch on the port side, and then tried to get down, but were driven back several times. Men from the John Currier, a Japanese man-of-war, and other vessels came to their assistance and they poured water on the fire until they got it under. The air-shaft would not permit of smoke escaping from the hold into witness's room, it was not an ordinary iron ventilator but half sky-light and half air-shaft. Witness's berth would be very nearly on top of the fire or probably about 12 feet above it, but on the other side of the ship. Witness could form no idea of how the fire occurred. He had suggested to his room mates that it might be spontaneous combustion. Witness firmly believed it was accidental. There were only rags, for one thing. He had one other experience, when he found some oiled rags had caught fire of themselves, and if he had not discovered them early that ship might have been set on fire. Witness had some experience in kerosene ships before; he had found that there was always a leakage of the oil. Witness thought no one could get down into the hold the way the hatches were sealed. He did not believe that a man could get down by the air-shaft; it might not be impossible, but it would be very difficult. He never noticed whether the sails, after the fire, were soaked with oil. He recognised the knife produced as his; the mate had borrowed it from him. He had never seen the tin before. He had no special reason to complain of the ship, he had been in a better. He and his mess-mates had always agreed. The tin produced looked as if it were cut but witness knew nothing about it. He did not think it was likely that any man had caused the fire.

R. S. Laurance, master of the American ship John Currier, said on the morning of the 14th his chief officer called him and told him the Troop was on fire. Witness ordered him to lower the boat and take a crew on board, and dressed and proceeded to the ship himself. He asked assistance from the Japanese and American men-of-war, and also went to the King Edward, in whose boat he proceeded to the Troop. He found smoke issuing through the hatches and ventilators. Both the crew of the Troop and that of witness's ship were pouring water down the hatches. Witness went down the hatches as soon as possible. He found there had been a fire about 30 feet forward of the main hatch, a little on the port side, and another fire on the starboard side near the hatch. The fires were not connected in any way. He saw some cases of kerosene had burned through, and some pieces of sail and the wood of the deck were burning. Witness had had 12 years' experience in a kerosene ship. He thought incendiarism was the chief cause of fire in such ships. He had one ship burned seven years ago at Kobe by two men setting it on fire. He should say a ship could not take fire from the spontaneous combustion of oily rags.

James Matthew, watchman on the Troop, said on the morning of December 14th he was on duty. At 5.30 he saw smoke coming out of the main hatch, and he reported it to the mate. Witness then called up the crew. He met the boatswain as he was going to call the crew, but did not speak to him about the fire. He had no idea how the fire originated.

William Scott said he was called out between five and six o'clock and he went out at once. After the fire had been put out witness saw the place where the starboard fire had begun. He noticed two tins of oil in the centre of the fire on top of the sail. The stoppers were out of both of them. He tried to pick them up but they were so hot that he could not touch them, so that he kicked them out of the way. There was oil in them when he kicked them. He should think that something had been put on the sail by the way in which it burned. Witness did not see the fire on the port side at all. Witness found by the mainmast aft of the main hatch, the tin with a cut in it. Witness called to the mate, and showed him the case. The previous Friday or Saturday there was nothing in that place. Witness thought the cut was made by a knife. There was no oil on the ground near the case when he discovered it. He thought a man could get down the air-shaft. He could not say how the fire was caused, but he thought the ship was set on fire intentionally. Witness knew the knife produced. It belonged to the boatswain. The boatswain's bunk was next to the ventilator. Witness did not know whether he should hear the noise of anyone going down the ventilator; he was a very heavy sleeper. He thought a man could get down the ventilator; he himself might be able to do so, but he was not sure.

James Osteen, able seaman, said he was called by the watchman between five and six o'clock, and with others helped to put out the fire. The fire looked to witness already the work of an incendiary. Witness had heard the boatswain say he would like to drop a pound of dynamite down the pipes. In the excitement of the fire witness cried out, "How could fire have broken out there?" and the boatswain said, "Them wet sails must have took fire spontaneously." Every one knew the sails were dry. Witness knew of no friction between the boatswain, the officers, or the sailors. Witness was on pretty good terms with the boatswain. "They aint no seamen, you know, sir, that isn't growling more or less." (Laughter).

The witness Withers recalled, produced the entry in his log, which was read.

Witness, in answer to Mr. Bonar, said a man named Hagg had told him that the boatswain had said he would set fire to the ship before he left her.

Mr. Bonar—You never said that this morning.

Witness—I never had the chance.

Mr. Bonar—Have you had any conversation with this man since this morning on the subject?

Witness (after hesitation): Yes, I asked him if he was willing to swear that when he came into court.

Nils Hansen, ship's boy, also gave evidence. He said he should have heard the noise of anyone going down the air-shaft. He had never known of anyone going down the air-shaft.

Axel Hagg, another able seaman, was called. He said he once heard the boatswain say he would put fire into the ship before he got out of her, or when he got out of her. The boatswain had said it more than once. Witness did not know what was his reason for saying this.

The Court adjourned till ten o'clock this morning for the evidence of the second mate, the cook, and the carpenter.

The Naval Court sat again on Wednesday morning to enquire into the circumstances of the fire on board the sailing ship Troop.

The master, recalled, said he had that morning taken the measurements of the air shaft leading into the hold. He made two men go through the ventilator that morning. One was a very large man. It was not at all difficult to go up and down. Witness always made it a point to keep the ventilator open to air the cargo. It was always open except when it was raining. It was raining the day previous to the accident, but in any rate the ventilator would not be locked. The other day the mate went up and down in witness's presence. A man would probably be noticed going down the ventilator in daylight, as it was in full view of everyone.

S. S. Dunning, an American citizen, master of the sailing ship George R. Scholfield, said he went on board the ship the morning of the fire in company with Capt. Fritz. Witness was positive that there were two distinct fires, and that one of them could not have been caused by sparks from the other. Witness at once came to the conclusion that the fires were not accidental, because from his experiences of kerosene ships he knew it was impossible for a fire to smoulder for 48 hours without its being detected. He knew the hatches had been closed for that length of time. He came to the conclusion that a man must have got down the air shaft. He had been carrying kerosene for eight years, but had never had any fires.

Emil Meyer, able seaman on board the Troop, said his duties were those of sailmaker. He had been engaged on the work for the last time about 36 hours before the fire broke out. He was prevented from working on account of the rain, which necessitated the closing of the hatches. He left the last sail he was working at on the port side of the ship just near the main match. The sail was dry when he left it, and there was no kerosene about it. He never used a kerosene case to sit upon. He saw the sail after the fire, when it was in pretty poor condition. It appeared to him that something like kerosene oil had been put on the sail. Witness never smoked while he was at his work; he would be forbidden, and he knew so much himself. If the fire were caused by accident it would be a great accident; he did not think it could be accident. He had never heard any one threaten to put the ship on fire. He saw the boatsman and a Russian "chap" whose name he did not remember putting some planks down the hatch the afternoon before the fire.

Henry N. Gilbert, a man of colour, said he was cook on board the Troop. He said on the day of the fire he was kneading bread when he heard an alarm of fire. He had seen the fire and he thought it was impossible that it could be caused by sparks from the galley. He had no theory as to the fire.

William Blanchard, second mate, said he ordered the hatch to be opened for a short time on the day before the fire to put some lumber down between decks. The boatswain and a man named Peter did this work. After the fire was extinguished he noticed that there were two separate fires. When the hatch was opened witness was standing near the hatch all the time. If a man had lighted the fire at that time it would have been discovered before. It was impossible that the fire could have been accidental. The boatswain had told witness that he was going to get out of the ship, and would leave no money behind him. That was told witness in a friendly way; witness had had no quarrel with him. The boatswain was not very comfortable in his position; he was incapable of doing what he ought to do. As far as witness knew he was on good terms with the men. Witness had seen the tin and knife produced. The knife would produce such a cut as that on the tin.

A Greek, the carpenter of the Troop, whose evidence was interpreted by Mr. Delbourgo, said he had no idea how the fire occurred. He described the alarm, and what took place afterwards.

The boatswain Gorig, recalled, said his knife had not left his possession for a week previous to the fire. He had never missed it. It could not have left his possession without his knowing. He did not think the knife was heavy enough in the back to make a cut like that in the tin. He thought it would leave some mark on the knife. Witness was asked to fit the knife in the cut; and then said he thought such a knife could cause the cut. There were several knives of the kind on board. He did not know until that morning that it was possible for a man to get down the air shaft.

The second mate stated that he wished to add that if anyone else had gone down the air-shaft besides the boatswain he would have been heard by the latter.

The Court retired for about three-quarters of an hour, and on their return into Court the President (Mr. H. A. C. Bonar) read the finding. It was to the effect that the fire resulted from the wilful act of some person or persons unknown, who caused the sail to be saturated with some inflammable substance, and set fire to the ship in two places. The Court attributed the act to some of the members of the crew, but held that there was not sufficient evidence to fix the guilt upon any person or persons. It enjoined the captain and officers to make all possible efforts to find out the guilty party, and ordered the owners of the ship to pay the costs of the enquiry, £12.9s. 2d.

H.B.M.'S COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before H. A. C. Bonar, Esq., Consul and Assistant Judge.

THURSDAY, December 22nd.

THE FIRE ON THE "TROOP."

Emil Gorig was charged with wilfully setting fire to the British ship Troop, the property of Raymond Parker, of Egremont, Cheshire, on December 14th.

Mr. F. J. Lowder appeared for the prosecution. He said the evidence he should submit would be chiefly circumstantial, as in nearly all cases of arson, and would consist in the negation of any natural predisposing causes. It would be for his Honour to decide whether sufficient evidence had been adduced to put the accused on his trial before a Jury.

Nelson Arnold Withers, mate of the Troop, a Canadian by nationality, was then called, and practically repeated the evidence he had given at the Naval Court of Inquiry. He gave the measurements of the airshaft leading to the hold, and said a man could easily get down it. He had gone down it himself at sea without any difficulty. He described the fire, and the result of his investigations after it was extinguished. He said the temperature in the 'tween decks was pretty cold. An iron ship such as the Troop was like a refrigerator in cold weather. It was certainly not warm enough to cause a fire. The sails were dry and in good condition, and there was nothing to account for their spontaneous combustion. There were never any oiled rags in the 'tween decks to his knowledge; when such rags were used they were thrown overboard. Witness described the effects of the fire, which he said could not have been caused by sparks from the galley fire. He produced the kerosene tin found below with a cut in it. He said he knew if any of the men had cut the hole they would have used sheath knives and he therefore tried to fit a sheaf knife in the hole. It did not fit at all, and he came to the conclusion that such a knife could not have been used. He tried the knife he borrowed from the boatswain, and found that the cut was one such as might have been made by this knife. He repeated his reasons for suspecting the prisoner.

By prisoner—He had no quarrel with the accused, and no grudge or prejudice against him.

The Court then adjourned for tiffin.

After the interval the master, Edwin John Fritz, deposed that the accused was shipped at New York as a substitute.

William Blanchard, second mate of the Troop, said the day before the fire the hatch was opened for a few minutes, and a man called Peter went down. He was there about ten minutes. The hatch was then closed and sealed by the Customs House officer. Witness was at the hatch, and Peter was under his observation the whole time. The seals of the hatch were intact on the morning of the fire. Witness identified the tin and knife produced. The cut could not be made by a sheath knife. The accused had told him several times he did not like the ship, and would leave her without leaving any money behind him. He believed the cut was made by the knife produced.

The prisoner put several questions, which did not, however, appear to have much bearing on the case.

In answer to the Court the witness said when he first saw the fire the sails were blazing, which he did not think would be the case unless they had been impregnated with kerosene or some other inflammable substance. He found two tins of kerosine standing on the sails on the port side with the screws wrenched out of the top, so that the oil could come out if the tins were tilted or thrown down. One of the sails seemed to have been saturated with oil. Witness had no prejudice against or quarrel with the prisoner.

William Scott, ship's boy, also gave evidence. He recognised the knife and tin produced; he found the tin after the fire. The accused was the only man he knew with a knife like this. Three days after the fire accused told him he thought the fire had been caused by spontaneous combustion through the sails being wet.

By prisoner: Prisoner had said to witness in course of conversation that if he were the mate he would get all the knives on board to see if they would fit the cut.

By the Court: Witness might wake and he might not through the noise of a man scrambling up or down the air shaft.

James Osteen, able seaman, an American by nationality, repeated the evidence of the accused's making the suggestion that the wet sails must have taken fire spontaneously. He believed accused must have known that the sails were dry; no sails were put down wet.

Witness believed the knife produced did not belong to accused, but to a seaman called Paul Meihs, belonging to the starboard watch. If it did not he (witness) was badly mistaken. He had seen accused having another knife. All that witness remembered of the night before the fire was that the men of the forecastle were awakened by an irruption of rats, and they had to set to work chasing them. He afterwards thought these rats must have been frightened by the fire.

Axel Haig, a Swede, able seaman on board the Troop, said he remembered on one occasion when accused and witness were working and cursing together (laughter). Prisoner said he would like to set fire to the ship. After the fire he and accused were talking about the matter and witness said "How could fire have come aboard the ship?" Accused said it must have come from oiled rags thrown down into the 'tween decks. As a matter of fact no such rags had been thrown there; they were always heaved over the side after being used. The knife produced belonged, witness believed, to Paul Meihs, but was used by the boatswain for some time.

Accused put a number of questions leading up to this "Was I mad when I made remarks about setting fire to the ship?"

Mr. Bonar—By mad you mean angry, of course?

Accused—Yes.

The witness answered the question in the affirmative.

At this point the Court adjourned.

SIR HENRY HAWKINS.

It is always been a matter of surprise that Mr. Justice Hawkins never rose to a higher position among her Majesty's Judges than a seat in the Queen's Bench Division. Perhaps it was his lack of social influence, or else his sturdy independence that trackled to neither political party. Whatever may have been the cause, there can be no doubt that Sir Henry's exceptional gifts never received their full measure of reward at the hands of those who have great offices to bestow. He was the son of a Hertfordshire gentleman, and was born at Hitchin on Sept. 14th, 1817. Having received his education at Bedford Grammar School, he adopted the law as a profession, entering the Middle Temple. He was a very diligent special pleader before his call to the Bar, in 1843, and after a year or two rapidly acquired a very large practice as a junior. He attached himself to the Old Home Circuit, and after he obtained his silk gown, in 1858, he was for many years one of its leaders. He also became a Bencher of the Middle Temple. As a junior, Mr. Hawkins was one of the Counsel (with Serjeant Byles) for Sir John Dean Paul, in 1855; and (with Mr. Edwin James) for Simon Bernard, who was tried as accessory to the conspiracy against the life of the Emperor Napoleon, in 1858. After he became a Queen's Counsel he was engaged in nearly every important case that came before the Superior Courts. He was associated with the late Lord Chief Justice Bovill in the great Roupell cases against the claims advanced upon the evidence of Mr. Roupell. In the famous convent case, "Saurin v. Star," tried in 1869, Mr. Hawkins led for the defence; and he was leading Counsel for Mr. W. H. Smith, whose seat for Westminister he successfully defended before Mr. Baron Martin. He was associated with the late Lord Coleridge in the first Tichborne trial, when he particularly distinguished himself by his exhaustive cross-examination of Mr. Baigent. In the prosecution of the Claimant for perjury, Mr. Hawkins led for the Crown, and the skill he displayed in this trial—one of the most protracted and the most remarkable in the annals of jurisprudence—greatly increased his reputation as an advocate. In the Probate Court Mr. Hawkins led the case in support of the will of the late Lord St. Leonards, which he established both before the Judge Ordinary and the Court of Appeal. The Gladstone and Von Reable cases were among his victories in the Divorce Court. Mr. Hawkins was Counsel in numerous election petitions; was engaged for many years in every important compensation case; acted for the Crown in the purchase of lands for the National Defences, for the Royal Commissioners in the purchases of the site for the new Law Courts, for the City of London, and for the Metropolitan Board of Works in the purchase of property required for the Holborn Viaduct, the Thames Embankment, and various new streets; and was Standing Counsel for, and held the general retainer of, the Jockey Club. He was appointed a Judge of the High Court of Justice (Queen's Bench Division) on Nov. 3rd, 1876, and was transferred to the Exchequer Division, when he received the honour of knighthood. And now at the age of 81, he has retired full of years but sturdy still, mentally and physically.

GAME No. 464.

Showalter and Janowski signed articles on Thursday, 17th Nov., and under its terms the match will be played for $750 a side, and at the rate of seven games per fortnight. In case the score of the match should be six a side, the contest will be continued until one player has won ten games, but in case the score should be at any time nine wins each, the match will be considered drawn. The initial game, which was played on the 18th Nov. in the presence of a distinguished company, was secured by the visiting player.

Janowski is proving himself to be too strong for Showalter. The Kentuckian's nearest approach to a victory thus far was the draw he obtained in the third game, played on Thanksgiving-day. The score now stands three game to nothing in favour of Janowski.

The score of the first game follows :—

FAMOUS MEN WHO PLAYED CHESS.

Walter Pulitzer in The American Chess Magazine (November), [illegible] of the famous men of the world who played chess or were interested in the noble game. He begins with Haroun Al Raschid (caliph of Bagdad, 780-809), "who," Mr. Pulitzer says, "must have certainly known the game, to have understood the subtle Chessic reference contained in the following—which was sent to him by Nicephorus (Byzantine Emperor, 822): 'The Empress Irene, into whose place I have succeeded, looked upon you as a Rukh (Rook?) and herself as a mere Pawn, therefore she submitted to pay you a tribute more than double she ought to have extracted from you. All this is owing to female weakness and timidity. Now, however, I insist that you immediately repay me all the money you received from her. If you hesitate, the sword shall settle our account." The great Haroun, being a hot tempered monarch, scribbled (perhaps with a lead pencil) on the back of this missive: 'From Haroun, commander of the Faithful, to the Roman dog Nicephorus: I have read thine epistle, thou son of an infidel mother. My answer thou shalt see, not hear,'—and he was as good as his word, for then and there he marched into Heraclea, laying waste his enemy's territory and forcing him to plead for peace. As to Charlemagne, there is a story of his once having lost his kingdom over a game to Guerinde Montglave. Then, too, the Empress Irene (above referred to) presented the great king with a splendid Chess-board and a set of men,

"It is on record that Canute the Great played. Carlyle in his 'Early Kings of Norway,' relates how during a game between the illustrious Dane and the Earl Alf, some dispute arose which resulted in the Earl throwing over the board, for which rash act he was murdered by Canute's orders. . . .

"Of early English sovereigns there are traditions that King Arthur, William the Conqueror, and Richard I. played. Early English historians have affirmed that it was King Arthur who first introduced Chess into England, and that it was often his wont to play it with the Knights of the famous Round Table, while others have maintained that it was unknown to Britishers until William the First brought it over from Normandy. It is, however, well known that Henry II. and Charles II. were much addicted to the game.

"From England to France (where I have reason to believe Chess, le Axedrez de la Dame, as it was called, was known long before it crossed the Channel), is but a step. Alexander Nickham in his 'De Naturis Rerum' recounts a story about Louis the Sixth (King of France, 1008-37). It appears that Louis the Fat was fleeing from the field of battle after his defeat by Henry I., when a fearless knight pursued him, and, seizing his bridle, exclaimed, 'Hold! the King is my prisoner'; whereupon poor Louis, brandishing his sword in the air, cried, 'Flee, ignorant and insolent knave. In Chess, the King can not be taken,' and split his assailant in twain.

"Besides Louis, it is recorded, that many of the early French kings played the game.

"Alexius I. (Byzantine Emperor from 1001 to 1018) is reported to have played the game as a means of diverting his mind from the concerns of state. So at least says his daughter, the famous Anne Comnena, in her 'Alexiad' (1083).

There was John Huss, the famous Bohemian reformer, who confessed during his imprisonment in 1414, that it was his having played Chess in early life that made him so subject to irritable outbreaks.

One of the most justly celebrated rulers of the thirteenth century was Alfonso X. of Castile, surnamed 'The Wise,' who, first by his causing the Bible to be translated into Castilian, and second by his own great code and other works, did so much for the advancement of the Spanish language and literature. Yet he found time to play Chess, and, what is more, wrote a treatise on it.

Pope Paul II. (born 1468), who excommunicated Henry the Eighth of England, was quite a devotee, and played often with Paolo Boi, the famous Sicilian player, to whom, so the story runs, he once offered a cardinal's hat after having been brilliantly vanquished in the Vatican. But the Sicilian declined this honor. Among the other important personages who met Boi over the Chess board may be mentioned Sebastian, King of Portugal (1557-78), who was a good player and passionately fond of the game.

"It was Liebnitz (born 1046), the famous German philosopher and mathematician, who made that oft-quoted phrase, "Chess is too much of a game for a science, and too much of a science for a game," which unfortunately seems to remain the popular idea of Chess even in this day. John Oliver Hobbes says, 'Artistic Chess is beyond the petty restriction of a science,' and this rings much truer than Liebnitz's narrow dictum, which perhaps he had in mind when he wrote.

"A sincere enthusiast of the royal pastime was Sir William Jones (borne 1740), the first English scholar to master Sanscrit. As a result of his Oriental studies and long residence in India, he was enabled to throw much new light on the origin and early history of the game. Sir William was among the first to venture the since accepted theory that Hindustan is the cradle of chess. His fame as Orientalist and linguist is secure, but he will be remembered as a man remarkable in many respects. There is true poetry in his 'Caissa,' one of the most charming, as it was one of the earliest, of Chess poems.

"Among noted Englishmen of this same period who worshiped at Caissa's shrine, may be mentioned Erskine, Gibbon, Fox, Lord North, and the Duke of Argyll. Francis Bacon played Chess, so did also Walter Scott."

Mr. Pulitzer promises to give us more information along these lines.

PILLSBURY.

The editor of the American Chess Magazine is authority for the statement that H. M. Pillsbury has been engaged by him to make an exhibition tour of the American continent, during which the champion will stay in all places, big and little, where chess or checkers are played as far as the time mentioned in the contract, four months, will permit. The start was expected to be made early in December.

Pillsbury, when questioned recently concerning a possible match with Steinitz, said he did not anticipate an early meeting with the veteran, but that such a contest would be agreeable to him if it could be brought about on any reasonable terms. He states that he entertains the kindliest feelings toward the veteran and would let no formalities stand in the way, and incidentally calls attention to the fact that he has never appropriated the title of American champion.

Mr. Steinitz is reported as having said when Pillsbury's remarks were called to his attention that he did not wish to be understood as intending to challenge for a match, nor that he called Pillsbury's title to the American championship into question. If there was a match it would be without any challenges on either side, and brought about by the good offices of the interested parties. If ever he did issue another defi, it would be for nothing less than the world's championship, so long held by him until dethroned by Lasker.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

WE extend to our readers best wishes for a

Happy and Prosperous New Year.

THE Admirals have finally left Crete.

THE Budget has passed the Lower House.

THE Diet has risen for the New Year holidays.

CHRISTMAS Day was delightfully fine in Yokohama, bright, windless, yet frosty. The Church services were largely attended and greatly enjoyed.

RICE is falling in price all over the empire, but trade is very dull.

THE plague is increasing in Formosa and at Tamatave, Madagascar.

RECENTLY the Mitsui Bank decided to increase its capital to yen five millions.

BRO. E. C. FOX has been installed W. M. of the "Star in the East" Lodge, No. 640, ALTOGETHER 108 deaths from plague have occurred at Tamatave, including one European.

WE chronicle this week the death of the Rev. C. E. Garst, which took place in Tokyo on Wednesday.

THE French Senate has adopted a Bill prescribing the death penalty in the case of officials found guilty of treason in times of peace.

SENOR SAGASTA, Premier of Spain, is suffering from pulmonary catarrh, and his condition is causing anxiety. Spanish stocks are falling.

ACCORDING to a telegram received by the North China Daily News, Russia has agreed to the opening of Port Arthur and Talienwan to trade.

THE Tokyo Fire Insurance Company at its general meeting on the 14th or 15th proximo, will declare a dividend of 12 or 13 per cent. per annum.

ILOILO has been surrendered by the Spaniards. At present the Philippines are in possession, but it is expected that American troops will eventually occupy the place.

MR. SUZUKI SHOTO, a prominent poet, died on the 24th inst. He has been suffering since the autumn of last year and was staying at Naka, Awa Province, for his health.

MR. HOSHI, the ex-Minister to Washington, and leader of the Liberal Party, left Tokyo on the 27th for Atami. It is expected he will stay there through the New Year recess.

A THIEF entered the office of the Meiji Coal Mining Company in Fukuoka Prefecture, on the 28th inst, and stole yen 13,000 from a small safe and yen 1,181.50 from a larger one.

VISCOUNT KATSURA, Minister for War, on the 20th entertained the military attachés of the Spanish Legation and the Brazilian Legation, who are leaving for their respective homes.

THE President of the British Chamber of Commerce at Paris, speaking at a dinner, was able to state that the Queen's visit to Nice had been decided on, proving the existence of better diplomatic relations.

H.I.H. THE CROWN PRINCE proceeded to the Palace on the 23rd at 10 A.M., and had an audience of Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress. On the 25th he left for the detached palace at Numazu

ON Friday at 9.30 A.M., two trains collided at Koyama station, Tochigi Prefecture, and eight passengers received slight injuries. Both engines were seriously damaged. The cause is said to be the negligence of the pointsman.

THE BANK OF JAPAN.

The tax which the Government proposes to levy on the Bank of Japan is exciting a good deal of discussion, and some of the figures quoted with reference to the subject would be interesting were it possible to be sure of their accuracy. But whatever may be the trustworthiness of Japanese calculators when they have an abacus in their hands, their method of notification is so defective that mistakes perpetually creep into their printed statements. As to the Bank, its untaxed note issues covered by securities—not specie—are at present limited to 85 million yen. But of that total it has to set aside 22 millions for the use of the Treasury, and to lend 5,900,000 without interest to the National Banks, so that 57 millions only remain available for its general business. Moreover, it is required to lend 10 millions to the Specie Bank at 2 per cent., and, of course, it can not keep its issues up to their full limit; the average is some eight millions less than the legal maximum. Taking all these things into account, it will be seen that the Bank receives 200,000 yen annually on its loan to the Specie Bank, and that it lends about 40 millions to its general clientèle at an average net gain of about 6 per cent. Hence its total net earnings upon its note issues aggregate 2,600,000 yen. On the other hand, it has the following special outlays :—

	Yen.
Expenses of transacting the Treasury's business	800,000
Cost of manufacturing convertible notes	200,000
Loss on 42 millions of 5 per-cent. Bonds which it is obliged to keep in its vaults (taking the loss at 3 per cent.)	1,260,000
Total	2,260,000

These figures show a net gain of only 340,000 yen annually, or about 1.13 per cent. on the paid-up capital of 30 million yen. If, now, the limit of the Bank's note-issues be raised to 120 millions, which would mean 93 millions available for general purposes instead of 58 millions; and if 80 millions are actually used at a net gain of 6 per cent., an addition of 1,800,000 yen must be made to the above total of profits, and from that addition we must subtract 1,237,000 yen, which the Government proposes to take as tax. Hence, finally the Bank, after paying the tax, will still find that its net income has been swelled by 563,000 yen in consequence of its increased note-issuing power, and its dividends should show an improvement of 1.87 per cent. We fail to see how any other conclusion can be formed, though some of our vernacular contemporaries seem to think that the Bank will suffer a great hardship under the proposed scheme of taxation. The plain fact, as we stated at the outset, is that the Bank receives an additional capital of 35 million yen at 3.54 per cent. approximately, and if the leading bank in Japan counts that a hardship, it must be in a very exceptional condition.

THE CABINET.

The Asahi talks confidently of Cabinet changes having for their object the organization of a coalition ministry. Our contemporary does not imply that the Liberals are pressing for anything of the kind, but it regards such a result as the natural outcome of the situation, and says that the nation would be glad to see it, as giving promise of a stable Cabinet.

A DIRTY HANDED POLITICIAN.

A story is going the round of the vernacular newspapers about Mr. Koyama Kiunosuke, a member of the House of Representatives. Mr. Koyama was the gentleman who recently accused a fellow-member of having been bribed, and received a slap in the face by way of reply, the result being a flare-up in one of the corridors of the House. He is a disciple of Mr. Nakai Tokusuke, who also had a seat in the House in former years, and who went by the name of the Rousseau of Japan. Mr. Nakai, according to common report, obtained his seat by the assistance of the Yeta of Osaka, and not infrequently came down to the House in such a condition that sleep rather than legislation occupied his attention. He had a fine free fancy, and a charmingly frank habit of openly acknowledging incidents which most men would prefer to bury fathoms deep. Mr. Koyama was a member of the Progressist Party quite recently. The story is that he received four thousand ren—two thousand in ready money and two thousand in securities—to desert his Party, and presumably to vote for the Land-Tax Bill. He took the money, and then sent in his resignation from the Progressist Party, saying that he was really too poor to neglect such a wind-fall, but that he hoped to return to his allegiance by-and-by. Thereafter he calmly proceeded to the House and voted against the Land-Tax Bill, explaining that he had been paid to leave the ranks of the Progressists, but that there had not been any stipulation about the Land Bill! The newspapers call him a worthy disciple of Nakai Tokusuke.

The Yorozu Choho alleges that it has interviewed Mr. Koyama, and gives his verbatim account of the bribery incident. "If I hadn't taken the money," he is represented as saying, "some other rotten fellow (fuhai-kan) would have got it. Besides, if there were plenty of men like me, bribery would be out of the question. It wouldn't pay to give big sums to fellows who fobbed the coin and didn't rat after all. The fool for his pains in this case is Oyamada Shinzo" (one of the Highest-tax-payers members of the House of Peers). "He invited me to a tea-house on the evening of the 19th and gave me the money. There were other rotten fellows there and I told them to take what they could get and do nothing for it. Oyamada wanted to force me to return the coin because I voted the wrong way, but I soon made him change his tune. I heard that the Government had half of the interest on the Emperor's 20 million yen to spend on buying members. Why shouldn't I get some of the money?" The papers suggest that Koyama should be ostracized. Turned out of the House and criminally prosecuted would be nearer the mark. But what is the man? A lunatic, or a liar with a political purpose?

Mr. Koyama continues to make extraordinary revelations to the Yorozu Choho, which, while publishing them, speaks of him in the most contemptuous terms. It introduces its account of the last interview by saying that Koyama came to the office of the newspaper, and warmed his dirty person at the stove while he ventilated his dirty opinions. It would seem that the Yorozu does not believe this wonderful receiver of bribes. Neither do we, for the matter of that. We are especially sceptical when Koyama alleges that he gave the whole of the money to needy politicians and Soshi. He announces that he thinks of organizing an association of Soshi; congenial work, we should think. But after all, the man is a member of the House of Representatives. Either he is a conscienceless liar or some very corrupt practices have been going on. How does it happen that no one takes up the matter? Is the House of Representatives content to have such a man occupying a place among the country's legislators?

DEFECTIVE CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

It is well to invite the attention of the Authorities to a letter which appears in our correspondence column, describing the case of a man who was the victim of an apparently serious injustice. We use the qualifier "apparently" because our correspondent's statement of the facts is not sufficient to form the basis of a hard-and-fast conclusion. A man is arrested on a charge of fraud and forgery; he is kept in prison for a year and a half before his final trial; bail is three times applied for and three times refused, and at length the man is acquitted. That is an ugly story as it stands. But we can not be sure by any means that the Judge was wrong in refusing bail. The custom in Japan is to refuse bail when there is legitimate ground for apprehension that by setting the accused person at liberty he will be in a position to destroy or efface the proofs of his guilt. Such an apprehension was probably entertained in the case referred to. At any rate, we are not justified in assuming that the refusal to grant bail was an abuse of authority or a disregard of justice unless we can found our assumption on the facts as they presented themselves to the Judge. In short, incidents of this character require very careful investigation before any final inference can be drawn from them. But we can not forget that this case is by no means singular. Complaints of a like nature have been made on various occasions during recent years, and their aggregate effect is to create a conviction that criminal procedure in Japan has a very serious defect. The framers of the Code are understood to have believed that by providing bail, and by enacting that not more than 48 hours must elapse between the arrest of a suspected person and his examination before a magistrate, abuses of the kind under consideration would be avoided. But their confidence has not been justified by experience, as they themselves have acknowledged, and it is said that the amended Criminal Code, which will be submitted to the Diet this session, corrects the defects of the Code now in operation. It is well, however, that cases like these described by the Rev. A. F. King should be made known in order that public opinion may not become apathetic.

BOARD OF AUDIT.

Mr. Yamada Nobumichi, formerly Governor of Fukushima Prefecture, has been appointed President of the Board of Audit in succession to Viscount Watanabe Kunitake, whose resignation was accepted a few days ago.

PRINCE IWAKURA.

Several vernacular journals have denied that Prince Iwakura's resignation of his post in the Imperial Household Department is connected in any way with politics, but the Fiji Shimpo writes very positively and explicitly on the subject. It says that when Viscount Hijikata was Minister of the Household, he interested himself directly in Cabinet changes, carrying messages from the Sovereign to the Ministers, and assisting generally to adjust crises. Prince Iwakura cooperated with him in that procedure. But when the present Minister of the Household, Viscount Tanaka, came into office, he advocated a policy of complete "aloofness," and would have had Prince Iwakura take the same course. The Prince, however, did not agree. He considered that the old method was more loyal and helpful, and at the time of the fall of the Okuma Cabinet, he acted freely on his convictions. Viscount Tanaka showed some dissatisfaction, and Prince Iwakura at once resigned, persisting in his resignation despite the Viscount's efforts to dissuade him. That, in brief, is the Fiji's version. We should have supposed that the decision of such a point rested with the Emperor. If His Majesty's desires to have messages carried, the Chamberlains have no choice, surely?

LOCOMOTIVES.

The Imperial Railway Bureau recently invited tenders for twenty locomotives of English manufacture, to be delivered in lots of five. The tenders were opened on the 22nd instant, and were found to be as follows:—

Messrs. Takata and Company, for 5 locomotives	14,380
Messrs. Kondo and Company (on behalf of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson and Company), for 5 locomotives	13,700
Messrs. Mitsui and Company, for 5 locomotives	13,796
Messrs. Yamada and Company (on behalf of Messrs. Illies and Company), for 5 locomotives	14,000
Messrs. Isono and Company, for 5 locomotives	14,519
Messrs. Okura and Company, for 5 locomotives	13,025

Messrs. Okura & Company's tender being thus £675 cheaper for 5 locomotives, and £2,700 cheaper for 20, than the next lowest offer, was accepted. It is remarkable that this Firm has been successful in securing the Bureau's orders for the whole 74 English-made locomotives hitherto put up for public tender by the Government Railway Authorities. The fact certainly constitutes a strong tribute to the enterprise of the Firm and to the excellence of its business arrangements. Messrs. Okura & Company, in common with the Mitsui and certain other great houses, are among the Goyō Shōnin, or Government merchants, to whom some of the members of the House of Representatives and some of the party newspaper organs have been accustomed to allude in very offensive terms, as having enjoyed a suspicious excess of official patronage in the days when the system of public tender did not exist. It appears, however, that the Government's choice of agents was judicious, for if Messrs. Okura and Company's organization is such that in open competition they can win the race so frequently, we may reasonably infer that their manner of transacting business has always been efficient and economical.

MR. JOHN BARRETT ON THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. J. Barrett, recently Representative of the United States in Siam, made some interesting statements about the Philippines in an address delivered, a few days ago, to the students of the Semmon Gakko at Waseda. He said that virtually the whole of the island of Luzon is under the control of Aguinaldo and the Philippinos. The United States' troops hold Manila and its immediate vicinity down to Cavite, but Aguinaldo governs the rest of the island with its six millions of inhabitants. He has his duly organised administration, his cabinet, his portfolio-holders, his courts of law, his police, his local authorities, and his army of thirty thousand men. All these troops are not actually with the colours, but the entire force can be called out without delay, and all are provided with modern arms of precision. It is not exactly clear what attitude Aguinaldo intends to assume towards the United States. The organization at the head of which he stands was originally designed to resist the Spaniards in the event of America's restoring to them the sovereignty of the Philippines, but is not necessarily intended to assert the independence of the islanders whatever Power raises its flag at Manila. Some of Aguinaldo's lieutenants have employed language indicating an emphatic resolve to resist any and every foreign yoke, but Aguinaldo himself has preserved a discreet silence. Nevertheless it is plain that any attempt to break up his government and reduce his followers at once to a state of obedience would involve a protracted and costly military effort and must cause immense bloodshed. In fact, considering the nature of the country, the quality of Aguinaldo's troops—for although they can not be called skilled manœuverers or fine marksmen, they are sufficiently well drilled for concerted movements and sufficiently instructed in the handling of a rifle to be decidedly dangerous en masse—, and the difficulties of the climate, it is plain that a campaign against the new republic would demand the full energies of an army of twenty thousand men for a year, or even longer, and would be a much tougher job than anything that had to be undertaken in Cuba. But there is no occasion to drive Aguinaldo to extremities. Patience and tactful management can gradually establish American control throughout the island without any fighting or bloodshed. As for the resources of the Philippines, they are unquestionable. All the foreign merchants in Manila concur on that point, and are persuaded that the failure to develop the islands' capabilities in the past have been due solely to a defective form of government and to want of enterprise and capital among the people. America is temporarily obliged to employ a military administration at Manila, but she will soon exchange it for the system pursued by England in her colonies. There has been some talk about the debt of the Philippines and whether America should take it over, but the truth is that no such thing as a Philippines' debt exists in the ordinary acceptation of the term. Money is owed on account of the Philippines, but Spain herself is the debtor, and no source of local revenue has been hypothecated to the creditors. Mr. Barrett is strongly in favour of America's taking possession of all the Spanish islands in that quarter of the globe. He thinks that if Germany obtains the Carolines, she will soon be found in possession of a strongly fortified naval station which will most inconveniently affect the character of the American occupation of the Philippines.

THE RAILWAY PROJECT.

The latest shape which the project for the State purchase of private railways has taken, according to newspaper reports, is that nine lines—not four only as hitherto stated—are included in the scheme; that the shareholders are to receive five-per-cent. bonds, unredeemable for 25 years, and that the total amount of the bonds will be about 200 million yen. The military authorities are, of course, desirous of seeing the programme carried out. They have thoroughly investigated the German system, and they find it the best organized in the world for purposes of national defence, as it probably is. But among the civilian promoters there are doubtless not a few whose ruling motive is speculation, and the fact that such men are agitating in favour of the proposal is quoted by some newspapers as a strong argument against it. We can not sympathise with that view. Every great financial undertaking must offer some opportunity to speculators. The motive of this project, as we understand it, is to release the capital which has been fixed in railways. Considering that we have all been hitherto agreed with regard to the unwisdom of Japan's attempting to construct her railways with money so expensive as that obtained in her own markets, there should be no hesitation now about endorsing her wisdom in recovering the dear money thus expended and replacing it by cheaper. Such is plainly the intention of the Liberals in framing the proposal, for bonds secured by the Government and having a period of 25 years to run before redemption, would doubtless sell well in foreign markets, if not immediately, then surely at some future date. One question, however, has to be answered—is Japan in immediate need of floating capital? Most people would be inclined to answer in the affirmative without hesitation nor should we venture to contradict them. But, on the other hand, if any attempt is made to purchase bonds on a large scale in Japan, the buyer immediately finds the market rise against him. A banker told us recently that he wanted to make an investment in War Bonds or Consols, which were then quoted at 93. After he had operated to the extent of 2,000 yen, the price rose to 94. There can not be much desire to sell if a paltry transaction of that nature hardens the market so appreciably. Indeed, Japanese financiers say that the purchases commenced by the Bank of Japan last spring, under the Government's directions, and continued until October—purchases aggregating 40 million yen—, exhausted sellers, and that the remaining bond-holders are not at all anxious to realize. Of course that does not prove that if the money now sunk in railways were recovered, it might not find profitable employment in other enterprises. But it does seem to prove that there is no very keen demand for floating capital.

MR. SHIMADA'S EXPLANATION.

Mr. Shimada Saburo publishes a very full explanation of the circumstances that drove him to sever his connexion with the Progressist Party after 17 years of association, but we shall not attempt to reproduce, or even to epitomise, his statements, inasmuch as the consistent attitude which he has long maintained with regard to the Land Tax amply accounts for the step he has now taken. But there are some interesting points in his apologia. He assigns the State's increased expenditures to the operation of three factors, growth of public business, appreciation of commodities, and expansion of armaments. The two first factors are inevitable but the last admits of adjustment, and it was Mr. Shimada's contention that the only logical method of procedure was to discuss the expenditures as a preliminary measure, and having reduced them to their lowest figure, to pass then to the question of revenue, and vote whatever additional taxation might seem necessary. That very rational view was shared by Mr. Taguchi Ukichi and the members of the Hiyoshi Club—a small body of politicians—until the very evening before the eventful day when the Land Tax Bill came up for discussion; but, at the eleventh hour, they abandoned their intention of introducing an urgency motion on the subject, in deference to an engagement on the part of the Liberals that every effort would be made to cut down the expenditures, and in consideration of the prospect that the loss of revenue resulting from the reduction of the originally proposed rate of Land Tax —from 4 to 3.3 per cent.—would furnish a lever for compelling the Government to reduce the programme of military expansion. We learn from this statement how narrow and uncertain was the majority that carried the Land Tax Bill. If Messrs. Shimada, Taguchi and their comrades of the Hiyoshi Club—6 in number, we believe—had adhered to their purpose of refusing to discuss the Land Tax Bill until the estimates of expenditure had been passed, the majority in favour of the Bill would have been reduced from 27 to 11.

Unpleasant experiences are generally connected with the operation of seceding from one's political party. We judge from the articles which Mr. Shimada Saburo publishes in the Mainichi Shimbun that he is having such experiences. The small dogs of the press are snapping and snarling at him, and his name is on the lips of many folks who would rather see him notorious than famous. He adopts a a fine bold tone in replying to them, but we need not quote his arguments, for our readers must be already quite familiar with the motives that influenced him. In his last article, however, he makes a point which is interesting for its own sake, though it scarcely finds a fitting place in the context of a dignified apologia. He asks what degree of sincerity can be attributed to some of the Progressist leaders when they have among him a man like Mr. Shiraoka. It appears that Mr. Shiraoka acted as chairman at the great Maple Club meeting of the Anti-Land-Tax-Increase Union the other day. But the same Mr. Shiraoka voted in favour of Count Inouye's Bill for increasing the Land Tax a few months ago. In fact, he was among the forlorn band of 27 who cast white ballots when the Bill came up for final decision after all chance had been lost of tacking to it a measure for re-assessing the taxable value of the land. Mr. Shiraoka, therefore, appears to be capable of taking very sharp turns.

THE PROGRESSISTS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

It is alleged that the Progressists have either handed to the President of the Lower House, or intend to hand to him, a motion of want of confidence in the Cabinet. Their reason is that the Government originally asked for an increase of the Land Tax from 2½ to 4 per cent. in perpetuity, declaring the change to be essential for placing the finances on a sound footing, but subsequently agreed to an increase of only 3.3 per cent. for a limited period of 5 years. A Cabinet whose policy is subject to such violent fluctuations does not command public trust and is evidently unfit to manage the country's finances.

The tactics of the Progressists with reference to this motion are variously stated. Some say that the document has been openly handed in over the signatures of Dr. Hatoyama and 24 fellow-members, and that it has 134 supporters. Others allege that it is held back, the intention of its signatories being to try and have it passed by a snap vote when the Liberals are off their guard. Others, again, report that it was withdrawn shortly after being sent to the President of the House. We do not believe for an instant that Dr. Hatoyama would be a party to the surreptitious procedure indicated in the second of these accounts.

FIGHT BETWEEN RUSSIAN AND JAPANESE MARINES AT NAGASAKI.

Vernacular newspapers report that, on the 18th instant, a fracas occurred at Fuchi-Inasa, Nagasaki, between some Russian marines and two or three Japanese belonging to the Torpedo Detachment. About 40 Russians landed on that day and partook freely of spirituous liquors. Half-a-dozen of them, making their way towards the shore and finding the road too small, collided with a Japanese, Ishida Sadakichi, who thereupon expressed a stormy opinion of their doings, and had to beat a precipitate retreat. Ishida procured the assistance of two or three comrades, and these, having armed themselves with gymnasium poles, went in search of the Russians. The police interfered in good time, but we learn from the Yomiuri that one of the Russians "accidentally wounded his own face."

QUICK-FIRERS FOR JAPANESE ARTILLERY.

According to the Fiji Shimpo, the military authorities have decided to arm the Artillery, both field and mountain, with quick-firing guns after a design evolved by Colonel Arisaka. A trial of various weapons was made last spring on the Shimoshizu plains, and the cannon of the Japanese expert was considered the best. It fires 7 or 8 rounds a minute against one round fired with the weapons now in use, so that the power of the artillery will be greatly augmented. The guns are to be manufactured abroad.

COTTON SPINNING.

The current year has been a bad time for the cotton-spinning industry in the Far East. The Ewo Cotton Mill of Shanghai, from October 1897 to October 1898, actually made a considerable loss, which, however, it would be misleading to state in figures, part of it being due to causes not connected with the working of the factory. Mr. Alford, of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Company, spoke at considerable length when presenting the unfavorable report to the shareholders on the 21st instant. He attributed the trouble mainly to the abnormal price that the Company had to pay for raw material. But he offered no explanation of the fact, nor can we derive any information from his somewhat vague suggestion that "experience of the local market for the raw material had not proved valueless" for purposes of future working. Our readers may remember that from the outset we expressed doubts as to the prospects of the cotton-spinning industry in Shanghai, our forecast being that if the Chinese Authorities did not tax the finished product of the mills, they would tax the raw material on its way to the mills. Whether the latter measure has been adopted we do not know, but it is certainly very disheartening to learn that one of the chief advantages foreseen by the promoters of the industry—namely, an abundant supply of cheap material at their doors—has thus far proved illusory. Mr. Alford did not say anything about cost of labour, yet we have been informed by persons whose knowledge of Shanghai affairs should be unimpeachable that the Chinese in Shanghai have combined to demand large figures, and, further, that it has been found impossible to employ female labour, the small-footed woman being unable to move about with sufficient rapidity. One of Mr. Alford's remarks was that the tendency of the market had been to favour India and Japan during the year. The Japanese would scarcely endorse that dictum. The Shogyo Shimpo gives figures showing the average dividends paid by the Japanese spinning companies during the past six years:—

	First half-year.		Second half year.
1892 ...	11.16	per cent.	14 60	per cent.
1893 ...	11.10	,,	13 00	,,
1894 ...	12 40	,,	7 00	,,
1895 ...	9 40	,,	1 90	,,
1896 ...	9 40	,,	9 20	,,
1897 ...	9 40	,,	4 80	,,
1898 ...	5 90	,,	—

Thus the figure for the first half of the present year is 37 per cent. less than the lowest corresponding figure in any preceding year. The Tokyo journal, while lamenting such an infelicitous result in the case of an industry whose products have come to stand second on the list of Japan's exports, seems to find no better reason than that, owing to the unwarrantably large dividends which were paid at the outset in order to encourage shareholders, capital was unduly attracted to the enterprise—over-production, in short. That may be true to some extent, but we have heard another reason assigned by experts, namely, that the Japanese mills have hitherto been obliged to lay in large stocks of raw material instead of buying just enough to meet the requirements of the time, and that the cost of the capital thus invested has greatly crippled their operations. That theory accords with Count Inouye's project for supplying them with cheap working capital.

THE UNITED STATES IN THE FAR EAST.

We find the following in an American journal :—

A Washington special to the Herald says: Territorial possessions can be held by the United States and can be treated as foreign territory as far as the revenue laws of the country are concerned.

This in effect is the position taken by Attorney General Griggs in an opinion which he rendered in regard to the question of enforcement of the United States navigation laws in Hawaii. This opinion is of particular importance at this time on account of the important bearing it has upon the proposition to carry out the "open door" policy in dealing with the new insular possessions in the Orient. In this opinion the Attorney General said:

"The resolution of Congress with the corresponding action of the republic of the United States operated for international purposes to make those islands part of the territory of the United States. But when territory is acquired by treaty or conquest or otherwise its relations to the nation acquiring it depend upon the laws of that nation unless controlled by the instrument of cession. It may for certain purposes remain foreign territory temporarily or permanently, and is not presumed to be at once put upon the same footing as all other, but rather the contrary. When therefore Florida had been ceded and fully transferred to the United States, its ports were regarded as foreign within the meaning of our revenue laws."

The Attorney General also indicates that the position of the administration in adopting the "open door" policy would be much strengthened if it should be provided for in the treaty of peace, as he says in his opinion that when territory is acquired its relations to the nation acquiring it depend upon the laws of that nation unless controlled by the instrument of cession.

This question is of considerable moment to all nations having tradal interests in the Pacific. If the United States applies its tariff and navigation laws to its newly acquired territories, Hawaii and the Philippines, their prosperity must suffer severely. The theory of protection has no application to such cases. Neither the Philippines nor Hawaii has any industries that need be guaranteed against foreign competition, and the effect of imposing heavy import dues would be merely to oblige the inhabitants to pay high prices for commodities of daily use. A tariff for revenue purposes may, perhaps, be found necessary, but it should be as low as possible and should not discriminate in favour of any particular country's goods. One consequence of making the navigation laws operative in Hawaii would be that the steamers of the newly established Japanese Company, the Toyo Kisen Kaisha, which is working in cöoperation with the Pacific Mail and Occidental and Oriental Companies, must give up calling there en route for San Francisco, and the same difficulty would exist in the case of the O. & O. vessels, unless they were transferred to the American flag. Hawaii, of course, would be the chief sufferer by such restrictions.

EXPORT DUTIES.

It is stated that the Government has resolved to introduce a Bill for abolishing all customs duties on exports from the 1st of April next, that is to say, the beginning of next fiscal year. The resolve to abolish these duties has long been entertained, but differences of opinion have been entertained as to the time for taking the step, and rumour says that only lately was a decision arrived at. We do not vouch for the truth of the report.

THE MAYOR OF TOKYO.

The career of the first popularly elected mayor of Tokyo, Mr. Matsuda, threatens to be stormy. The Business Men's Association has decided that he should be required to resign, and has appointed a committee to exert the necessary pressure. Mr. Matsuda's offence, so far as we can discover, is that in his capacity of a Progressist member of the Lower House, he opposed the Bill for increasing the Land Tax, and it has come to be thought that every opponent of that measure is an enemy of the urban population. If the Land Tax was placed upon a really equitable basis, that is to say, if it was brought into accord with the principles of the Single Tax, a very different view would be taken of it by the dwellers in cities. But at present the great bulk of the Tax is paid by the farmers, and the business men of Tokyo naturally think that Mr. Matsuda should have advocated the proposal to increase it. If that be the reason of their hostility to the mayor, we can not compliment them either on their sense of fair play or on their economical acumen. The Land Tax will be their Old Man of the Sea one of these days so surely as Japan is progressive.

TONNAGE DUES AND THE "JIJI SHIMPO."

We owe an apology to the Jiji Shimpo for misinterpreting its meaning. We made it suggest that the annual proceeds of the proposed tonnage dues—estimated at 400,000 yen annually—should be invested in public bonds until an aggregate of ten million yen had been reached, when the annual interest should be applied to harbour improvement. What our contemporary really advised was that the proceeds of the tax should be hypothecated to raise a foreign loan of ten million yen, which should be at once applied to purposes of harbour improvement. The Jiji does not speak of any provision for a sinking fund, but it probably thinks that the tonnage dues would increase sufficiently to satisfy that requirement.

THE BARLEY CROP.

The barley crop is said to have been unusually good this year. In the columns of the Kokumin we find the following figures :—

BARLEY CROP

Year.	Number of acres under cultivation.	Produce in koku.
1890	4,254 292	18 712,965
1891	4,284,138	18,088.333
1892	4,343.432	15,941,276
1893	4,360 025	16,625 229
1894	4.375,282	19.809 965
1895	4.429,059	19.526,123
1896	4.411.726	17,329.317
1897	4.373,929	18 005 490
1898	4 496,780	20,413,543

The average area under cultivation is taken as 4,371,775 acres and the average yield, 17,914,906 koku.

On the 11th inst., the godowns of Messrs. Sandilands, Buttery, and Company, at Singapore, were totally destroyed by fire, involving a loss of about $60,000 The building, which was insured for $3,000 with the London and Lancashire Company, was completely gutted. The damage to the produce is covered by insurance, with the National Insurance Company of Ireland and the National Assurance Company.

COUNT OKUMA AND HIS OMORI CRITIC.

A present resident of Omori, who contributes various articles to the foreign-settlement press, disagrees with Count Okuma's opinion that the foreign trade of Japan has made remarkable strides during the past twenty-five years. We express no opinion as to the general question at issue between the Waseda Sage and his Omori critic, but there is one feature of the latter's arithmetic which startles us. He says that, in 1872, Japan's external trade totalled some fifty million yen, which, with the dollar at 4s. 6d., means 11¼ millions sterling—we use approximate figures—, whereas in 1897 the total figure was 290 million yen, or 29 million sterling. Hence, he concludes, the increase in a quarter of a century was only 17 or 18 millions sterling. That is certainly a quaint method of calculation, intelligible only on the hypothesis that for a Briton money has no statistical significance unless it be expressed in sovereigns. Why should Japan's export trade be converted into sterling? Does the Omori critic really imagine that every million yen worth of commodities exported by Japan in 1897, with the yen at 25 pence, represented only 463,000 yen worth of commodities exported in 1872 with the yen at 54d.? In order to justify such an assertion, he would have to show that the silver prices of commodities in Japan fell, between 1872 and 1897, in exactly the same ratio as the appreciation of gold in terms of silver, which can not be shown, being greatly opposed to facts. Why, again, should Japan's imports from silver-using countries be converted into sterling? They have nothing to do with sterling. To express them in terms of gold which fluctuated enormously in purchasing power, instead of adhering to their original silver prices, which remained comparatively stable, is to introduce an arbitrary and misleading factor which has no legitimate place in the equation. The only portion of Japan's foreign trade reasonably subject to conversion into sterling for purposes of statistical comparison from year to year, is the imports from gold-using countries, and even there a mere statement of pounds, shillings and pence is misleading, for since gold prices fell largely between 1872 and 1897, a sovereign's worth of imports in the latter year represented a larger bulk, and therefore a greater consumption, than a sovereign's worth of the same goods in the former year. It would be a difficult problem to establish a really accurate comparison between Japan's foreign trade in 1872 and 1897, if the statement had to be made in values, but it would also be difficult to depart more widely from the truth than the Omori critic departs.

STUMPING THE COUNTRY.

The Liberals are determined not to let the grass grow under their feet. They have just arranged that their best men shall visit all the provinces during the New Year recess for the purpose of addressing the various constituencies. It is a wise move, for many of the rural electors will doubtless be anxious to learn why their representatives voted for an increase of the Land Tax.

MR. BARRETT ON THE FAR EASTERN SITUATION.

WE report elsewhere an interesting lecture delivered by Mr. JOHN BARRETT, ex-Representative of the United States in Siam. Mr. BARRETT prefaces his remarks with a warm eulogy of what Japan has accomplished. We agree with him in the main, but are bound to say that the rate of progress has not been maintained during recent years. The Diet, with the endless political squabbles that have marked its career, is largely responsible for this check. The twenty-four years immediately subsequent to the Restoration saw Japan with an ideal administration for progressive purposes. The management of her affairs was in the hands of a band of publicists, the best statesmen and in every sense the greatest men that the country possessed. Working in harmony, and imbued, one and all, with an earnest desire to carry the empire from its very backward place to a prominent position in the comity of nations, these administrators were able to direct the country's efforts into the best grooves, and to utilize its resources for the most advantageous purposes. In short, Japan's career was then moulded by the highest intelligence at her command. But after the opening of the Diet in 1891, national progress ceased to be the unique aim of the Government, and energies which had previously been employed solely in the empire's interests, had to be dissipated in adjusting party differences or devoted to removing friction which threatened to stop the administrative machine altogether. All that was, perhaps, inevitable, and there will doubtless be compensations by and by. But a more radical trouble is Japan's premature anxiety to shake herself free from foreign aid. It is perfectly natural that she should desire to walk alone. That is not the point, however. The point is that she is making herself singular among the nations of the world by unwillingness to employ foreign assistance where it would be really useful to her, and where by employing it she would not be making any acknowledgment of her own incompetence, but rather gaining esteem for liberal shrewdness. She has succeeded in making a brave show in many directions, and the world justly gives her credit for a great deal of solid and remarkably rapid progress. But she has been praised so much that she can scarcely have failed to form a false estimate of her own capacities, and it is not possible for any impartial observer to ignore the fact that she has not yet supplied herself with really high standards, and that, in their absence, her tendency will be to retrograde rather than to advance.

Perhaps the most striking part of Mr. BARRETT'S address is his reference to the state of affairs in China. He speaks with diplomatic caution; but that rather adds to than diminishes the force of his remarks. Russia is all powerful in China to-day. When the news of her Liaotung coup reached us, together with the details of the railway concession she had obtained, we expressed the conviction that Manchuria must henceforth be regarded as a Russian provice. Everything has tended to confirm that impression. If Russia has now agreed to open Port Arthur and Talien to foreign trade—a statement which we greatly doubt—, it is merely a temporizing measure; a device to postpone complications which would be inconvenient just at present. She means to have Manchuria. People who have been there recently say that the very air is Russian, and that foreign residents and Manchurians alike have quietly resigned themselves to the fact. It is the same in Peking. Russian influence can be felt everywhere. A member of the Tsung-li Yamên is universally believed to be in Russia's pay, so that all the conferences and communications between other Powers and that Department are immediately known at the Russian Legation. The Cossack trooper, too, is everywhere. Twenty or thirty Cossacks dash out for exercise in a different quarter of the city daily, flashing in and out of the vista of the citizens in the north, in the south, in the east and in the west, and creating the impression that Russian troops have the capital at their mercy, while the little bands of marines stationed at other Legations, stay at home carefully so that their presence may be as little hurtful as possible to Chinese prejudices. Russia is playing her own game and playing it very cleverly. No one blames her, and if she were a Liberal Power whose policy was to admit all nations to the privileges she acquires, her successes would be a matter of general satisfaction. But she is an exclusive Power. Wherever she plants her foot, other nations are excluded. If, again, she were acquiring territories to which no Western State had enjoyed previous access, there would be little to say against her aggressions, from a practical point of view. But Manchuria and China are fields that have been already thrown open to the world's commerce and intercourse, thrown open primarily and principally through Great Britain's exertions, and all encroachments by an exclusive Power upon such fields means an unlawful restriction of the privileges acquired there by Europe, America and Japan under treaties and conventions. It is not possible to regard Russia's doings with indifference. How to correct the situation she is creating may well perplex the statesmen of the countries whose interests are menaced. Something must be done. England has pursued a policy which, though eminently praiseworthy on moral and cosmopolitan grounds, can not be called successful. The alternative policy is not pleasant to contemplate, but unfortunately it seems to be growing more and more inevitable day by day. Mr. BARRETT speaks with bated breath. His meaning, however, is plain enough, and British subjects as well as Japanese have reason to be grateful to men who, like him, are not content to embody the results of their observations in official despatches only.

THE SINGLE TAX.

VISCOUNT TANI, speaking in the House of Peers, accused Mr. TAGUCHI of employing new-fangled foreign theories to delude ignorant folk, and Count OKUMA, denouncing any increase of the Land Tax, declared that such a measure would array the urban population against the rural in an endless warfare. The former statesman seems to do a great injustice to foreign intelligence; the latter appears to regard the Land Tax in a light entirely different from that in which it is regarded by Western economists. We have received much correspondence on this subject, and we observe, with pleasure, that a movement is on foot among journalists in Tokyo to familiarize the public with the real principles of the Single Tax. It may be opportune, therefore, to say a few words on the subject.

One of the factors tending to obscure this question is defective nomenclature. We speak of a "land tax," thereby suggesting that an impost is levied on the land itself. That is not the case. The impost should be levied on the value of the land. The difference is fundamental. If the tax were assessed in terms of the produce of the land, as used to be the case in feudal times in Japan, it would not be in accord with the basic principle of the Single Tax. Moreover, it would then be a tax with invariable results so long as its rate was unchanged, for the products of a given area of ground are practically invariable. But the value of those products varies greatly, and the variation is due to causes which are beyond the control of the land-owner, and by which he has, therefore, no right to profit exclusively. This brings us to the first principle of the Single Tax; a principle which appeals to the most rudimentary sense of justice. It is that the individual is entitled to the sole enjoyment of the fruits of his labour; the community, to the common enjoyment of nature's gifts. Land is a natural opportunity. It is given by nature to all alike. No one person has any natural right to use land for his sole benefit. If he puts his labour into land, he has a right to the products of his labour, but he must first subtract from them the value of the land itself; that is to say, the premium which he has to pay to the owner—whether as rent or as purchase money—for permission to use the land. On that premium the Single Tax is levied. It is a tax on the ownership of land, not on its use or improvement. In assessing land for the purposes of the Single Tax, all values created by individual use or improvements, in short, all values created by individual labour, are theoretically excluded, and the only value considered is that due to means of communication, situation, population and such factors. In other words, the payer of the Single Tax contributes to the public exchequer a sum determined, not by what he produces, but by the value of the natural opportunities which he is allowed to enjoy. Land in Japan has increased greatly in value since the Restoration; not because the quantity of its products has increased, but because their value has increased. To what is the latter increase due? Not certainly to greater industrial efficiency on the part of the user of the land. The same labour that produced a koku of rice thirty years ago must be expended upon its production to-day. The increase is due to improved means of transport, by which remote regions have been brought within reach of the great markets, and to a steady growth of general prosperity with a corresponding elevation of the scale of living and appreciation of prices. It is plainly unjust to the community at large that the benefit of such changes should be enjoyed solely by the land-owner. The enhanced value of the nation's natural opportunities belongs to the nation. Politicians obscure the subject by talking of the petty land-owner. There is no question of degree and there can not be any question of degree. The principle is universally and uniformly applicable. A violation of the general right is a violation, whether it be on a small scale or on a large. The owner of land is the owner, whether he lets the land to another or uses it himself. The Single Tax is levied on him in his capacity of owner, not in his capacity of user. It may be that some land-owners in Japan who are also land-users, pay already as much tax as they can afford to pay. But if it be so, then one of two cases must be true: either these combined land-owners and land-users paid formerly the double or the treble of what they could afford to pay, which is an obvious absurdity; or, owing to insufficient taxation of the value of the land, its profit-giving capacity has been augmented so as to lead to its excessive division. But such questions lie entirely beyond the range of the theory itself.

We seem to have spoken here of agricultural land only. But everything we have said applies equally to urban land. The great mistake, as we think, of certain Japanese publicists is that they regard the Single Tax in the light of an impost upon the farmer not on the city dweller. In point of fact the Single Tax takes no account of the use to which land is put. If assessed with theoretical correctness it would compel the owner of land held idle to pay just as much as the owner of land in full use. The value of the land for letting purposes is the sole basis of assessment. The essential feature of the tax is that it secures to the community the product of opportunities created by the community. Nowhere are such opportunities more conspicuous than in the chief cities. The land in Tokyo, for example, derives its value from the presence of a great population and the consequent facilities for carrying on profitable enterprises of commerce and industry. Such factors are not due to individual labour: they are created by the community. Every tsubo of land in Tokyo, in Osaka, in Kyoto, in Nagoya, and in all urban districts should be taxed on the basis of its rentable value. Were that done, perfectly equal incidence of taxation would be established throughout the length and breadth of the empire, and there would be no room for deceptive rhetoric about the comparative hardships of the farmers and about conflicts between urban and rural populations. When we say "every tsubo" we mean literally every tsubo; not merely land in use but land held idle by speculators. One of the beauties of the Single Tax is that it forbids speculation in land; forbids great capitalists to withold large tracts of land from general use for purposes of individual gain.

It should not be necessary to catalogue the advantages of the Single Tax, but we do so briefly. It dispenses with all taxes on the products of labour and substitutes one impost on land values. It gets rid of a number of vexatious and troublesome taxes and of a multitude of costly tax-collectors. It simplifies fiscal administration to an incalculable degree. It removes all the temptation to fraud and corruption inseparable from the existing system, since it deprives the tax-payer of any opportunity for concealment, the land being a visible asset assessible by means which the land-owner can not falsify. It equalizes the incidence of taxation with absolute certainty. It encourages labour and the enterprising use of capital instead of penalizing them as do many of the taxes now levied; for taxes on houses, industries, and so on, are nothing more than fines imposed upon every one that puts up a handsome building, establishes a company, erects a factory, or otherwise adds to the wealth of the country. It solves the labour problem finally.

We have not space to write an essay, but must content ourselves with these mere outlines. On two points, however, emphasis should be laid. The first is that nothing prevents universal acknowledgment of the truth of the Single Tax except the difficulty of putting the theory into practice. In the majority of Occidental countries individuals have obtained unconditional possession of the land, and are thus enabled to appropriate solely to themselves profits which, as the outcome of natural opportunities, should belong to the community in general. Something like a revolution would be necessary to change that order of things. But happily for Japan her case is different. By a fortunate accident she is in a position to organize an ideal fiscal system. Nothing is necessary except to re-assess the taxable value of the land on a renting basis. Does she intend to deliberately throw away that inestimable advantage in order to adopt the illogical, uneconomical, and demoralizing system now unhappily pursued in Europe in America?

The second point is that so far from increasing, she would certainly diminish the weight of taxation in the rural districts if she altered her basis of assessment so as to bring it into accord with the principles of the Single Tax. Land in rural districts has no great value compared with land in towns and cities. Moreover, the increase of the former's value is virtually limited whereas the increase of the latter's is in perpetual proportion to the growth of the city's population and prosperity. It is impossible to conceive any greater misapprehension than that which calls the Land Tax an unfair burden on the agricultural classes. The Land Tax —we speak of the Single Tax—is expressly designed to leave labour absolutely untaxed. Hence, where Viscount TANI and others draw sentimental pictures of the farmer working from sun-rise to star-light, they demonstrate only their own complete unfamiliarity with the subject, for whether he worked from the dawn of creation to the crack of doom or slept from daisy-day to Yule-tide, his diligence or idleness could not in the slightest degree affect a tax levied, not on his labour, but on the natural opportunity that he enjoys as a land-holder. The greater his industry the greater the products of his labour, which products, according to the axiom of the Single Tax, are entirely and absolutely his own, not liable to any impost or fine of any kind.

MR. HOSHI TORU.

Mr. Hoshi Toru has certainly had an ample revenge. Not many years have elapsed since the House of Representatives removed him from his position as its President and actually deprived him of his membership. Nothing in the history of the House reflects such discredit on it as that act, which was justly denounced at the time as a flagrant exhibition of party prejudice. Mr. Hoshi's constituency returned him at once as its representative, but he shook the dust of the House off his feet and went to Washington as Minister. Now, he is the most prominent figure in the House. A great party obeys him implicitly, and a word from him can make or mar a measure. Events move quickly in Japan, but there has been something kaleidoscopic about these recent chapters of Mr. Hoshi's career. He is certainly a master of political tactics.

THE BOOKSHELF.

Chinese Fiction (Religion of Science Library), Rev. G. T. CANDLIN, Chicago, Open Court Company, Publishers.

PROBABLY no field of literature has been less explored than that of Chinese fiction. The late Mr. Bancroft Joly published, in 1893, two large tomes, a literal translation of the Dream of the Red Chamber, one of the most celebrated romances of China. Two volumes, containing in all about a thousand pages, did not conclude this wonderful romance, but two volumes are all that we have had the pleasure of perusing. Perhaps Mr. Joly did not find any encouragement to continue his task. Perhaps ill-health interrupted it. But even two volumes constitute a monument of human patience. The impressions produced upon us by reading them were profound respect for a country where life is so long and uneventful that such stories can be a favorite pastime of generation after generation, and profound respect for the ability of a writer who, under the guise of romance, presented to his countrymen such a subtle satire on the customs and habits of the idle upper classes. The author of the Dream may almost be called the Rabelais of China, if we can imagine Rabelais without the disgusting coarseness that disfigures everything he wrote, for though the Dream deals only with the petty, the pettiest, affairs of ever-day existence, and makes no demand whatever on the imagination of the readers, it accomplishes for the gentlemen of China precisely what Rabelais accomplished for the noblemen and the courtiers of France, covers them with contempt and ridicule. Yet, it may be justly doubted whether a dozen Anglo-Saxons could be discovered who take even a faint interest in the moral attributes of the Chinese patrician, and the Dream of the Red Chamber probably failed to find any circulation in its English dress, though in Chinese it has passed through innumerable editions. The whole subject of Chinese fiction is now again brought upon the tapis by the Rev. G. T. Candlin, who contributes a long essay to the September number of the Religion of Science Library. After a somewhat lengthy and, as we think, unnecessary exordium to prove that the religious phase of a nation's character is truly reflected in its works of fiction, Mr. Candlin strongly traverses the view almost invariably taken by Western critics of China's romance literature, namely, that it is "crude, puerile, and grossly impure." He denies the justice of any one of these epithets, and declares that "the Chinese have an enormous quantity of prose imaginative writing, the great bulk of it by no means despicable, and some portions of it of a very high order of merit, which does not yield in interest or in literary finish, though perhaps it does in imaginative force, to the best Western fiction." That is a bold assertion and we are compelled to say that Mr. Candlin's selected specimens of Chinese literature do not seem to confirm the propriety of his very free praises. As to the magnitude of the library there can be no question. The list of prohibited novels alone contains a hundred and thirty-seven different works, from which the bulk of the whole repertoire may be roughly inferred. At the head of all stands the History of the Three Kingdoms, wherein are recounted the adventures of the three heroes Liu Pei, Kuan Yuin and Ch'ang Fei, figures that play almost as conspicuous a part in art as in fiction. This "masterpiece" was compiled during the Yuan era. Indeed, we learn from Mr. Candlin that the earliest Chinese romancists do not go farther back than the 13th century, the whole list of writers being included in the history of the last three dynasties, the Mongol, the Ming and the Tsing. Of the History of the Three Kingdoms, Mr. Candlin says that it is "not surpassed in any language for simplicity, force, and fertility of imagination." The three heroes, the "Three Musqueteers" of Chinese fiction, are all in very common walks of life. Liu Pei, though of royal lineage, is a shoe-seller and mat-maker; Kuan Yuin, a refugee, and Ch'ang Fei a vendor of wine and a butcher of pigs. Their portraits adorn the pages of the book—exceedingly ugly portraits, for in the matter of book illustration the Chinese never approached the Japanese. The three come together in the most haphazard fashion, swear fidelity to each other in a peach orchard, and repair at once to the wars, followed by three hundred braves who seem to have had no hesitation in placing themselves under the command of a shoe-seller, a refugee, and a pig-butcher. The story is thenceforth a long record of battles, murders, and sudden deaths, interspersed with transcendental surgery, magical strategy, superhuman swordsmanship, miraculous horses—as "Red Hare," which could gallop a thousand li a day, taking seas and mountains in his stride—, and, of course, woman's wiles. Mr. Candlin calls it the "Iliad" of China. We wish that he or some other competent scholar would translate it, but when we remember that eager students from the West have been prying into Chinese literature for a hundred years, we become sceptical that a new gem has been discovered now. Whether the author of the San Kuo Tsu was a Dumas or a Homer, there can be little doubt that the compiler of the Contending States of the Eastern Chou was the Munchausen of China; an artistic Munchausen too, for he prefaces his collection of "extravagant, miraculous and scandalous legends" with a statement that as he has not even time to tell the whole truth, he can not possibly be suspected of having leisure to concoct falsehoods, and therefore, though the veracity of his matter may render it dull, the reader can trust it from point to point. He is, in fact, a very refined liar, and again we wish that some one would translate him. Then there is the Annals of the Water Marshes, concerning which Mr. Candlin writes that "its style is phenomenal—coarse, direct, graphic, intense, each word like a fierce stroke from a graver's tool." Tantalizing information, and having given it, Mr. Candlin should really afford the world an opportunity of sharing his transports at first hand. His brochure is most interesting. We have only touched upon a portion of its contents; have not attempted to follow him from the historical romance to the mythic tale and the sentimental novel. But all seem to be well represented in the Chinese library, and we should not be surprised, perhaps, that Mr. Candlin claims for this people a rich endowment of "the mysterious creative power of imagination which gives to genius its light and to love its glory."

KOREA.

The Emperor of Korea has not only refused to pardon Pak Yong-ho, but has ordered the arrest of the person who petitioned for grace for the exile. His Majesty declares that Pak is to be regarded for all time as an arch-traitor. Farther ministerial changes are also reported from Söul, and the little Empire appears to be again falling into a state of unrest. It is the Cuba of the Far East.

SPIRIT OF THE VERNACULAR PRESS.

We have just witnessed a war between the hoe and the abacus in the Diet and the abacus won the day. The next great issue to be fought over is the amendment of the Law of Election. The Japan of to-day may be compared to England in the 17th century. The farmer is regarded as the foundation of the State and the merchant and manufacturer receive little consideration. But a change has been inaugurated. Henceforth the agriculturist will cease to be valued so highly and the urban interests will receive more and more consideration. A struggle has commenced which will probably last a long time, but its issue is pretty plain. The present Diet will continue the work it has begun, and, before it separates, will deal some further blows to the agricultural interest.—(Asahi Shimbun.)

The present Diet will probably bring its session peacefully to a close. Yet it can not be inferred that the Government is strong. The truth is that the country had become weary of unending political squabbles and perpetual cabinet changes. The people longed for some semblance of peace and stability, and the Liberal Party, appreciating the spirit of the time, lent its aid to bring about the desired change. But the Liberal Party itself is now likely to become an element of renewed disturbance. It has not worked for nothing. It began by waging an implacable war against the Government. Then, after a long struggle, it completely changed its tactics and became the Cabinet's ally. But it has never changed its purpose. It aims at getting the administration into its hands, and sooner or later its claim must be considered. Will the present Cabinet consider it? When the medicine is swallowed we forget its bitterness, says the proverb. The Government is very apt to forget the dangers and difficulties from which the Liberals rescued it, and in that case the struggle will be renewed as fiercely as ever.—(Fiji Shimpo).

The teaching of the time is that a close relation exists between military equipment and commerce. Germany's case is a good illustration. Her military strength is so enormous as to seem like an intolerable burden, yet her commercial development proceeds with extraordinary rapidity year by year. Her seizure of Kiao-chou appeared at first to have been dictated solely by a desire for territorial expansion, but was subsequently seen to have for its purpose the acquisition of mining and tradal privileges in the province of Shantung. England offers even more striking evidence. She is the leading commercial nation of the world. Her tradal and industrial supremacy is unanimously admitted. Yet there is no country in the world that wages so many wars. It may almost be said that she is never at peace. These facts deserve the attention of Japan's business men who object so strongly to the expansion of the State's armaments. Can they find an example of a nation which is commercially great without having military strength? The expansion of armaments is not merely the best method of insuring a country's life: it is also an indirect means of creating floating capital. The view taken by the business men is superficial and short-sighted.—Kokumin Shimbun.

The system of Government in Japan stands greatly in need of reform. The conduct of public business in the communes is almost at a standstill. So frequent are the changes of local governors that no one thinks it worth while to be active or enterprising. In the central administration, during the past two years, officials may be said to have led a kind of hand-to-mouth existence, never knowing what the morrow might bring forth; and it has been almost equally bad in the provinces. The country's best interests are suffering severely from such a state of affairs. May we hope that at last an era of comparative stability is in sight?—(Kokumin Shimbun).

The Progressists are approaching their doom. They played a gambling game and have lost heavily. From the time of their first appearance upon the stage the support of the urban population was the chief source of their strength. But now they have turned their back upon their old allies and become champions of the agricultural interest. Thus they have lost the support of the commercial and industrial classes. Have they, on the other hand, gained the allegiance of the rural population? It can not be alleged that they have. The rural population does not know what to think. It hesitates to trust men who have thus deserted their old constituents. At all events, there can be little doubt that the urban districts will no longer vote for Progressist candidates, and one consequence of their unpopularity in the cities will be a decrease in the circulation of their newspaper organs, which means a corresponding reduction of the area through which their views are disseminated. Again, can they hope to retain the cooperation of the Iwasaki family, who have been their great source of financial strength? In pledging themselves to the policy of imposing the whole additional burden of taxation on traders and industrials, they have alienated the Iwasaki, whose wealth is all invested in commerce and manufactures. Finally, there is Count Okuma's health. Count Okuma is the Party's mainstay. Deprived of him, their disintegration would follow speedily. But Count Okuma is not a strong man. He has never been a strong man since the bomb shattered his leg. The prospects of the Progressists are gloomy.—(Jimmin.)

The Government's policy in imposing heavy tonnage dues is not consistent. With one hand they grant subsidies to steamship companies and with the other they take back what they have given. The Directors of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha are asking for a further subsidy of 600,000 yen to help them to maintain their services to foreign countries, and it is understood that their application has met with official approval. Yet, at the same time, it is proposed to levy a tonnage tax which will greatly increase the expenses of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. If the Company is in a position to pay a large additional tax, how can it be in a position to justly claim State aid?—(Shogyo Shimpo.)

The proposed tonnage dues are unquestionably a fair and proper tax, but if they are levied without any compensatory measures the effect may be very injurious. It is plain that if foreign vessels have to pay heavily on entering Japanese ports, they will if possible avoid making Japan a place of call, and will prefer Chinese harbours whenever they can make a choice. The people have had practical experience of the loss resulting from that sort of thing, for during the past two years the number of foreign men-of-war visiting Japanese ports has greatly diminished. Of course in one sense that is a matter for congratulation. But its financial consequences have been very bad. What is obviously expedient is that if tonnage dues are collected, the proceeds should not be absorbed into the general revenue, but devoted to purposes of harbour improvement. If Japan takes toll from a foreign vessel entering one of her ports, she is bound to provide all possible facilities in the matter of good anchorage and the loading and discharge of cargo. The tonnage of foreign vessels visiting this country yearly is 3,770,000 tons. The dues paid by them at the proposed rate will aggregate some 400,000 yen. The money ought to be put into public bonds until a capital sum of 10 million yen has been accumulated, and then the interest should be devoted to harbour improvement.—(Jiji Shimpo).

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF CURRENT JAPANESE LITERATURE.

In Nos. 19 and 20 of the Taiyō appear two very long articles from the pen of Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō on the reform of Japanese orthography. Some of our readers are no doubt of opinion that this topic has already been fully discussed and would be glad to hear of some action on the part of those in authority in the direction of carrying out the changes and modifications which, it is acknowledged in so many quarters, are desirable. Dr. Inoue's essay is the most thorough that we have read on the subject. But space forbids us to do more than give the outlines of his argument. It is not necessary for us to go with Dr. Inoue into the extreme clumsiness and inefficiency of the present system. Any foreigner who has paid attention to the subject must have been more deeply impressed with this characteristic of the present mode of writing than it is possible for any Japanese to be. There is confusion everywhere, argues Dr. Inoue. This has been often shown in detail in these columns. We pass on to the proposed methods of reform. No less than eight of these are enumerated by Dr. Inoue. (1) It is proposed to reduce the number of ideographs in use considerably and to employ those as hitherto done with Japanese kana interpersed. (2) The substitution of katakana or hiragana for the Chinese characters has been recommended. (3) The exclusive use of Roman letters has been widely advocated. (4) The abolition of the Japanese language in toto and the adoption of English in its stead has been proposed. (The late Viscount Mori at one time thought this plan feasible.) (5) The invention of new symbols has been recommended. (6) The adoption of the Korean mode of orthography, which, as a system of phonetics, is superior to the Japanese method has been advocated. (7) The use of abbreviated signs such as serve the purpose of the stenographer has been pronounced to be the easiest way out of the difficulty. (8) Merivale's visible speech system has been recommended for adoption. To Nos. 2, 3, 5 and 7 alone is any importance to be attached, says Dr. Inoue. These he then proceeds to discuss in the following terms: At one time there was a strong feeling in favour of the adoption of Roman letters, but this has decreased considerably of late years, partly owing to the strong nationalistic spirit that exists and partly owing to the inconveniences connected with the use of Roman letters for writing Japanese. One of the chief of these difficulties is the tedious length which sentences written in an intelligible manner are apt to assume.* The Japanese kana has many advantages over Romaji in the matter of brevity and of familiarity to the people. Dr. Inouye goes into an elaborate comparison between the use of Romaji and the use of kana for telegrams, arguing that the kana prove most profitable in telegraphing to Korea, for instance. But it is quite plain that this argument cannot be relied on; as the present rates of telegraph companies are quite arbitrary and might be altered at any time. Dr. Inoue is in favour of the use of some kind of abbreviated form of the Chinese characters as a system of phonetics, which he thinks is all that is required. He is not altogether opposed to Romaji but prefers hiragana written crossways to Romaji. He gives a list of 25 articles and 8 pamphlets that have been written by well-known men on the subject of orthographic reform, and ends up by advising his fellow-countrymen not to be in a hurry to adopt Romaji, but to see whether they cannot invent a system for themselves that will answer better than the Romaji.

The Tōyōtetsugaku Zasshi, the Taiyō and the Sekai-no-Nihon all comment on the reform advocated by Dr. Inoue. The following is the gist of their remarks: Although from time to time articles have appeared on the subject of orthographic reform, says the Tōyōtetsugaku, for many years past no attempt has been made to found a society with reform for its special object. But on September 10th an Association of this kind was formed. The meeting of promoters was held at the office of the Gakushikai (Imperial University) on the above mentioned day. Among the attendants were Doctors Katō Hiroyuki and Inoue Tetsujirō and Messrs. Yatabe, Miyake and Anezaki. Various schemes for improving the method of writing were discussed. Among them that of Mr. Tanaka Shūho afforded matter for amusement. He proposes that the number of strokes required for a character be reduced by indicating by the hen (the left-hand part of the ideograph) the class of object to which the individual mentioned belongs and giving the Japanese name of the thing in kana. According to this plan, 鶴, tsuru, would be written 鳥つ and 龜, kame, would become 魚か. The Tōyōtetsugaku writes in very scornful tones of this method, but we are not sure that as a preparation for the entire abolition of the ideographs it is not worthy of being tried. But the organ we are quoting says that the bringing forward of such a proposal as the above was enough to throw ridicule on the whole reform movement.

The Taiyō is in favour of proceeding deliberately with the proposed reform. It is desirable that the advantages and disadvantages of all the various methods suggested should be thoroughly discussed. Those who desire to effect a change must not allow themselves to become wedded to any one method of getting over the difficulties of the situation. They must be ready to concede a great deal to each other. To us, says the Taiyō, it seems that by far the easiest way to begin is to agree to reduce the number of ideographs in daily use to as small a number as will suffice for intelligibility. This, though constantly proposed, has not been effected. The difficulty of making any changes whatever in practice may be judged by the fact that, with the exception of the use of kana and Romaji, none of the newly invented methods of writing Japanese have been employed by anybody but the inventors themselves.

The Sekai-no-Nihon says that one of the items of expenditure included in next year's Budget provides for a thorough investigation of linguistic reform. That the Mombushō recognises the importance of taking some action is sure. But whether that Department will ever summon sufficient courage to enforce the carrying out of any definite scheme of reform is very questionable, says the Sekai-no-Nihon; and if they do not, then the numerous meetings held and the articles written on this subject will all have involved useless waste of time, for this is a reform that can only be successfully carried out by the State.

A school has been recently found in Tōkyō called the Tōkyō Seiji Gakkō, with Dr. Matsumoto Kumpei as Principal. It will teach political economy, Finance, Law, Sociology and kindred subjects. It aims, we are told, at fulfilling the functions of similar institutions in Paris, Philadelphia, and elsewhere. It has the support of the principal newspaper editors and college professors of Tōkyō, and supplies a want that is said to have long been felt throughout the country. As a preparatory school to the Tōkyō Seiji Gakkō, an institution to be called the Meiji Eigakkō is to be established. The course in this school will extend over three years. The Tōkyō Seiji Gakkō will be located in Sarugaku-chō, Kanda, Tōkyō.

Professor Matsumoto Kōjiro and others have started a New Magazine called Jidō Kenkyū (The Study of Children). The design of this new organ seems to be to collect material bearing on the lives and thoughts of Japanese children, with a view to aiding school teachers and others in dealing with the young. So it is to be a kind of imitation of Professor James Sully's interesting work entitled, "Studies of Childhood." The first number has the following articles: "The Importance of Studying Children"; "The progress made in the Study of Children;" "Methods of teaching Morality to children in their homes." "Results of the Study of Children." "Methods of Study, and of using the knowledge acquired, &c." The office of the magazine is in Awaji-chō, 1 chōme, Kanda, Tōkyō.

The Sekai Tsūshi (Universal History) is a translation of a translation. The original work was that of Dr. Karl Ploetz, entitled "Auszug aus der alten mittleren und neueren Geschichte," which was rendered into English in America some years ago by Mr. William H. Tillinghast, and published under the title of "An Epitome of Ancient, Mediæval and Modern History." The original German work ran through 11 editions, and the English translation reached the sixth edition. The Japanese translation bearing the above title is by Mr. Wada Mankichi. Mr. Wada's work covers 930 pages. We are informed by the Shigaku Zasshi that Mr. Wada has consulted an 1895 edition of the original work and has added in an appendix all the notes contained in the original history. It is said that no such work exists in the Japanese language, and that the translator, while being faithful to the original, writes in clear, flowing language. The work sells at 1 yen 70 sen a copy at the Fusambō, Urajimbō-chō, Kanda, Tokyo.

Another translation of considerable importance is that of Dr. Hans Brum's history of the German empire, which in Japanese covers no less than 1,920 pages. Messrs. Kumamoto, Amatani and Shiraishi are the translators. The work is divided into two parts: the first part selling at 1 yen 30 sen and the second at 1 yen 70 sen, at the Fusambō. This history gives a minute account of the consolidation of the German Empire under Bismarck, the conflict between the Government and religious bodies, the relations of the Government to the Diet, the attitude and the character of political parties, financial schemes, legislation, the foreign policy of the country. Its colonial policy, and the methods to be adopted for increasing the revenue are also minutely discussed in Dr. Brum's work, which gives all that is worth giving of the public life of the founder of modern Germany.

A little book has just been published by the Keiseisha entitled Ro-shin Kankei (The Connection of Russia with China), by a writer who does not give his real name. The Shinseiki, in a review of the work, says that whoever the writer may be is evidently well-informed on the subject he has discussed and is in close sympathy with the Chinese, who, in the opinion of the writer, have for years past been the victims of Russian craft and aggressiveness. The 300 pages of which the book consists give the whole history of the Russian advance towards China and depict in striking language the present situation and all the danger to the peace of the Far East that it involves. The work is divided into 21 chapters, in which some 40 important subjects are discussed.

During the past few months five or six new periodicals have come into existence in the provinces. At Niigata, in place of the Tenrai, whose death we recorded some time ago, a magazine called the Hokuetsu Hyōron has been started, with every promise of success, says, the Shinseiki. The editor, Mr. Imaizumi, is a thoroughly competent writer and the first number contains several brilliantly written articles. The Nichi-eki Shinshi is a Buddhist fortnightly magazine of a popular type, designed for circulation in and around Saga. The Bunyū (文友) Zasshi is a monthly published in Hakodate, which, as its name implies, is strictly literary. The Shōyō is also a monthly issued in Matsuye, Izumo.

The Kōbe Jihō is a very up-to-date monthly, well edited, and with every prospect of obtaining a wide circulation, says the Shinseiki.

The Association known as the Naichi Zakkyo Jumbikai, whose object it is to devise measures for rendering mixed residence a success, has started a magazine, which is published fortnightly. It is called the Naichi Zakkyo-Jumbi Kai Zasshi and is issued at No. 2, Imagawa Kōji, Kanda, Tōkyō. Its fifth number lies before us. It contains a picture of Commodore Perry, who seems to be regarded as the originator of the idea of mixed residence in Japan. Among the subjects discussed in the magazine are, the introduction of foreign capital and the holding of land by foreigners as security; the operation of the new treaties and its influence on Japanese finance: what Japanese have to expect when mixed residence begins; the naturalisation law; and a discussion of various provisions of the new treaties. The writers are all specialists.

The 國士, Kokushi is a new periodical started by Mr. Kano Jigorō in connection will his athletic school called the Zōshikwai (The Samurai-making Society). The Magazine has for its object the training and instruction of a superior class of young men who shall combine manliness of spirit and love of sport with a high moral tone; the best type of the old samurai being taken as a model of what is desired.

The 京華日報 Keikwa Nippō, a daily whose birth has already been mentioned in these columns, is a thoroughly conservative organ. It is not connected with any political party, neither is it in league with the Cabinet. The report that it is the organ of Count Yamagata is denied by the paper itself. The views advocated in its columns are those of the nationalists and ultra-loyalists. It represents the opinions of such men as Messrs. Futamiya Kumajirō, Takimoto Seiichi, and Kimura Takatarō, who write for it. It is issued at No. 15 Shinsakana-machi Kyōbashi, Tōkyō.

The Okura Shoten are about to issue a new French and Japanese Dictionary, which promises to be a valuable addition to the all too scanty lexicographical lore of this country. The compilers are Messrs. Nomura Taikō and Mori Noriyoshi, assisted to a certain extent by M. Boissonade. The work has been revised by Messrs. Nakajima Bunzaburō and Abe Zen. The page measures about 6½ inches by 4½, and each page has 2 columns. There are 730 pages, over 80,000 words, and over 100 illustrations. It is said to contain most modern words and to have made a specialty of legal and military terms. The ordinary price will be 3 yen per copy.

ciples of Economy). Ginkō-ron (Banks) and Kōsai-ron (Public Loan Bonds) are by the Vice-Minister of Finance, Dr. Tajiri Inajirō. The two latter works are used as text-books at the Universities, the Higher Schools, and at various Commercial Schools. The first sells at 50 sen, the second at 1 yen, and the third at 1 yen 50 sen per copy, the Yūhikaku Shoten being the publishers.

The literary panic among magazines still continues. A change of name often turns out to be the prelude to decease, the new name proving to be what the Japanese call an okurina. The Meiji Hyōron, changed to the Chūgwai Jiron and then to the Jiron. We are now told that it has given up the ghost. The Shakai Zasshi has not been revivified by swallowing the Nihon Shukyō. It is said to be in a bad way and the delay in publication which is taking place is alleged to be caused by financial difficulties. The Shincho Gekkan (Monthly Review of New Books), the Shunyō Bunko and the Katei Zasshi are no more. The Teikoku Bungaku, commenting on this state of things, says that no doubt general financial depression has much to do with it, but there are other causes as well, the principal being the dearth of writers and lack of general interest in high class literature. The Taiyō observes that a life of 5 or 10 years is considered long for a first-class magazine in Japan and, in view of the evanescence of this class of literature, it becomes a question as to whether the whole business of magazine publishing should not be pronounced an unpaying concern in Japan's present financial condition. Would not most of the writers for magazines be better employed if they took to other pursuits? Mr. Takayama Rinjirō, the editor of the Taiyō, deeply regrets the loss of the Waseda Bungaku. This occupied a place in Japanese literature similar to that filled by the Edinburgh Review for so many years. Mr. Tsubouchi Shōyō gave to this periodical a very high tone and as a purely literary organ it was second to none. The 柵草紙 Shigarami Sōshi was earlier in the field, but its life was very short and its successor the Mesamashi gusa only bears a distant resemblance to it. The Waseda School of writers are a class by themselves. The young novelists, Shimamura Hōgetsu, Gotō Chūgai, Mizutani Futō, Sugitani Daisui, Minakuchi Biyō, Satō Meiyō and others were all offspring of the Waseda School and closely connected with the Waseda Bungaku. The Teikoku Bungaku has produced a good many reviewers and critics and a few new style verse writers, but not a single novelist. The Waseda Bungaku owed its wide influence principally to one man, Mr. Tsubouchi, who, as the world knows, is equally at home as a play writer, a novelist, and a scholarly critic. The difficulties that he had to overcome in establishing this organ would have baffled a man of less resolution. That after such a successful career it should cease for want of funds is, concludes the Taiyō, a most sad affair.

The Minpō Shinzoku Horon (the Civil Laws respecting Relations), and the Minpō Sōzoku Hōron (the Civil Laws respecting Inheritance) have been issued by the Yūhikaku Shoten, Hitotsubashi-dōri, Kanda, Tōkyō. They are both from the pen of Mr. Okuda Yoshito, who was a member of the Committee appointed to examine and revise the Civil Code. It is stated that both works have been compiled with great care, abound with illustrations of the meaning and interpretation of the provisions of the code culled from foreign sources and with lucid explanations of abstruse terms and passages. Mr. Okuda, it is stated, has criticised unsparingly some of the language employed in the new Civil Code.

An interesting fact was stated by Professor Bell to the audience which assembled at the Kanda Young Men's Association Hall on November 13th, to hear his lecture, a report of which appears in the Fukuin Shimpō. When Professor Bell was experimenting at Boston with his telephone, in 1876, Mr. Izawa Shūji came to see him. After showing Mr. Izawa what his instrument could do in the way of transmitting messages in English, the Professor suggested that Mr. Izawa should test its powers as a medium of communication in Japanese. Messrs. Komura Jutarō and Takamine Hideo were in America at the time, and Mr. Izawa at once put himself into communication with them, and the three together thoroughly tested the new instrument as regards Japanese. So that it turned out that with the exception of English, Japanese was the first of all the languages of the world to be transmitted through this wonderful medium.

Professor Naitō Chisō has furnished to the Kyōiku Jiron the text of a remarkable article which appeared in one of the new organs published in the South of China from the pen of Chang Chih-tung, and has added certain comments thereon. This article advocates in a very powerful manner the despatch of students to Japan and the adoption of other methods of bringing the two countries into closer contact will each other. The writer is of opinion that nothing can save China but Occidentalisation, and that the quickest and cheapest way of effecting this is by utilising the progress that Japan has made. The translation of Japanese works into Chinese presents few difficulties compared with rendering English or French into Chinese. The policy advocated by Chang Chih-tung includes the creation of a powerful army and navy and the encouragement of the building of railways.

In the Kyōiku Kōhō appears a report of a long lecture delivered by Dr. Katō Hiroyuki on the much discussed subject "The Reform of National Customs." We have only space for the gist of Dr. Katō's remarks on this topic. The deterioration universally complained of in the manners and customs of the nation, Dr. Katō attributes to the removal of all the old restraints on the liberty of the individual. Feudalism had many disadvantages, but there is no denying that its minute rules and usages acted as a wholesome restraint on society. Then the teaching of the Chinese classics on the subject of ceremony furnished models for the lives of the middle and upper classes. Buddhism exercised a similar sway over the minds of the lower orders. Individual liberty has been proclaimed far and wide, and the authorities that used to be considered supreme are now assigned a very secondary position. What is the remedy for this state of things? asks Dr. Katō. It is quite useless, he says, to be talking vaguely about the need of cultivating filial piety and loyalty. The two terms chū and kō have been drilled into the heads of the young till they are quite sick of them. The late Mr. Nakamura Keiu introduced a new method of teaching morality when he translated into Japanese Smiles' "Self-help." To this work he gave the title Risshihen (The Character-forming volume). In this book moral attainments of a high class are held up to admiration by means of short biographies of remarkable men. This mode of teaching ethics is far preferable to any of the abstract methods usually adopted. For the young it is far better that they should know what men have actually attained in the way of virtue than be furnished with an elaborate set of principles which are difficult of application. Practical morality must be placed first and foremost in any scheme of teaching. But when we come to theoretical ethics, then modern teachers rely chiefly on two sources of moral action, namely intuition and utility. The intuitionist will tell you that men need no external prompting, that if they will but follow the guidance of their own consciences, they will do right. The utilitarian; on the other hand, says that to follow intuition alone often leads one astray, that it is only by experience of the consequences of actions that we can judge of their real quality. This experience may be our own or that of others. When students reach a reasoning age, Dr. Katō is in favour of their moral ideas being placed on a rational basis. They should be taught that egoism and altruism are not antagonistic principles, but that in a properly organised community as well as in the individual minds of the best men they work in harmony. It is desirable that this truth should be illustrated in teaching by constant reference to the actions of the most virtuous men the world has produced.

In an article entitled "Literature and Royalty," the Kokumin Shimbun traces the connection of the Imperial family with the publication of various standard works. The Kojiki, the Nihongi, the Zoku Nihongi, the Go-Nihongi, the Fūdoki, the Manyōshū, the Kokinshū were all published in obedience to Imperial commands or under Imperial patronage, says the Kokumin Shimbun. Even after the Emperors ceased to exercise direct control over the affairs of State they still retained their connection with literature. Writers in the employ of the palace existed in all ages. Even in the Meiji era there is what is called the O-uta-dokoro, a bureau whose duty it is to collect and publish not only the verses penned by royal personages, but well-written poems on any subject in which His Imperial Majesty may be interested. If the patronage of the Emperor does not extend to other kinds of literature, it is because the advisers of His Majesty on these subjects are remiss in their duties, and not on account of unwillingness on the Emperor's part to give encouragement to literature generally. The Kokumin refers to the keen interest which Louis XIV. took in French literature during the latter half of the 17th century, and the progress that it made under his patronage, and then proceeds to observe that the officials whose duty it is to make suggestions to the Emperor on this subject should ask His Majesty to order the carrying out of the following proposals. (1) That a perfectly reliable and exhaustive history of Japan be compiled and published. (2) That in this history special attention be given to the Tokugawa and Meiji eras. (3) That a thoroughly exhaustive and accurate Japanese Dictionary be compiled. (4) An Academy of Learning, similar to the French Academy, be established and supplied with sufficient money to make it a success: this money to be given in a lump sum to be used as capital or in annual permanent grants. Also that prizes be given for essays, and other forms of encouragement be adopted. (5) That His Majesty be asked to allow noted writers to be presented to him, and that pensions be granted to them. (6) That when theatrical performances take place at court, that noted modern plays should be acted and His Majesty's attention be called to the writers of these plays. (7) That decorations, orders and pensions be given to those foreigners who have by their writings made Japan known to the world. One great cause of the non-appearance of any great literary work in the Meiji era is lack of appreciation on the part of the general public, says the Kokumin Shimbun. The patronage of the Emperor would undoubtedly give to literature the impetus it so much needs. The majority of our scholars do not possess the means to enable them to devote years to the production of learned works. The rank that the litterateur holds in this country at the present time is far too low. His Majesty the Emperor, if rightly advised, would, we feel sure, be only too ready to take steps for raising literature to a higher level, concludes the Kokumin Shimbun.

We read in the Tetsugaku Zasshi that at a meeting of the Philosophical Society held on October 28th at the Imperial University, Dr. Katō Hiroyuki attacked in a most vigorous manner Dr. Inoue Enryō's Anti-materialism treatise entitled 破唯物論 Ha-ibutsu-ron. Dr. Katō entitled his lecture Ha-haibutsuron (The Confutation of the Confuter of Materialism). The lecture is to appear in full in a later number of the magazine. In the report given in No. 411 we are told that Dr. Inoue's accusing materialistic philosophers of being responsible for all the money-worship that exists, was shown by Dr. Katō to be absurd. There is no real connection, observes Dr. Katō, between the deductions of the scientist from his study of matter and what is called the worldly and grovelling spirit of the age. To say that one causes the other shows a thorough misunderstanding of the whole subject.

JAPANESE LITERATURE.

MODERN LITERATURE UNDER THE TOKUGAWA SHOGUNATE.

1600-1850 A. D.

The next noteworthy event in Japan's literary history was the revival, under the early Tokugawa Shōguns, of the study of the ancient imperial records, and of the writings of the classic age. The great first Tokugawa Shōgun, Ieyasu, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, subjected and quieted the warring clans of the country. An age of peace, to last for the next two hundred and fifty years, was then entered upon. Of the most important results of the literary revival that accompanied these happy days for the State was the full maturing of a standard language for literature. What Yoshida Kenkō had begun in "Tsure zure gusa"—the amalgamation of a Chinese vocabulary with purely Japanese forms of speech—was well carried forward by the Mito school of historians towards the opening of the eighteenth century (the "Age of Genroku," 1688-1703); and as the century advanced, was perfected by accomplished critics, novelists, and dramatists of the times. To such critics as Keichiu (1640-1701), Kada (1669-1736), Mabuchi (1697-1769), Motoori, (1730-801), and Hirata (1776-1843), Japanese literature is indebted for elaborate critical commentaries upon the "Kojiki," the "Manyōshū, and the ancient Shinto ritual; and from them the writers of after days received models in composition and style. The novelists, especially Bakin (1767-1840), and Ikku (1763-1831), created much-prized works in fiction; Bakin, master of a style almost classical in quality, and Ikku, notwithstanding an objectionable coarseness of subjects, displaying great literary skill. In the Tokugawa period appeared, among many others, two remarkable dramatists: Takeda Izumo (1690-1756), and Chikamatsu Monzayemon (1652-1714),—the latter showing such minute analysis of the motives of human character and action that he has been called the Japanese Shakespeare.

With mention of the work of these writers this sketch of the course of Japanese literature may close. Within the last half-century the life of the Japanese people as a whole has been subjected to a radical revolution. This secluded nation has opened its borders to free intercourse with the rest of the world. The recent history of Japanese literature, interesting though it be, is yet in largest measure but a story of the importation and adaptation of Western thought to Japanese uses. For present purposes it need not come under consideration.

Illustrative translations.

THE WORTHLESSNESS OF CHINESE PHILOSOPHY.

[Mobuchi, pupil of Kada and teacher of Motoori, was a voluminous writer. "His chief aim, says Sir Ernest Satow' translator of the following extract from his writings, "was to carry out the idea originated by Kada, namely to illustrate the prehistoric age." As a leader in the revival of pure Shintō, he was strongly opposed to the influences in Japan of Chinese thought. His hostility is well shown in this passage from his Koku i-kō]

Wherein lies the value of a rule of conduct? In its conducing to the good order of the state. * * * While the Chinese for ages past have had a succession of different dynasties to rule over them, Japan has been faithful to one uninterrupted line of sovereigns. Every Chinese dynasty was founded upon rebellion and parricide. * * * A philosophy which produced such effects must be founded on a false system.

When Confucianism was first introduced into Japan, the simple minded natives, deceived by its plausible appearance, accepted it with eagerness and allowed it to spread its influence everywhere. The consequence was the civil war which broke out immediately after the death of Tenji Tennō in 671 between the emperor's brother and son, which only came to an end in 672 by the suicide of the latter. In the 8th century the Chinese costume and etiquette were adopted by the Court. This foreign pomp and splendour covered the rapid depravation of men's hearts and created a wide gulf between the Mikado and his people. So long as the sovereign maintains a simple style of living, the people are contended with their own hard lot. Their wants are few and they are easily ruled. But if the sovereign has a magnificent palace, gorgeous clothing, and crowds of finely dressed women to wait on him, the sight of these things must cause in others a desire to possess themselves of the same luxuries; or, if they are not strong enough to take them by force, it excites their envy. If the Mikado had continued to live in a house roofed with shingles, and whose walls were of mud, to wear hempen clothes, to carry his sword in a scabbard wound round with the tendrils of some creeping plant, and to go to the chase carrying his bows and arrows, as was the ancient custom, the present state of things would never have come about. But since the introduction of Chinese manners, the sovereign, while occupying a highly dignified place has been degraded to the intellectual level of a woman. The power fell into the hands of servants, and although they never actually assumed the title, they were sovereigns in fact, while the Mikado became an utter nullity.

ON PAINTING.

[This illustration of art criticism is from the "Tamagatsuma" (Wicker Basket) of Motoori, an entertaining miscellany by this modern master of Japanese prose. Professor Chamberlain, translator of the extract given here, says that "as a stylist Motoori stands quite alone amongst Japanese writers His elegance is equalled only by his perspicuity.....This greatest scholar and writer of modern Japan" was born in Matsuzaka in Ise in the year 1730, and died in 1801. "To him more than to any other one man is due the movement which has restored the Mikado to his ancestral rights."]

The great object in painting any one is to make as true a likeness as possible of his face (that is of course the first essential), and also of his figure, and even of his very clothes. Great attention should therefore be paid to the smallest details of a portrait. Now in the present day, painters of the human face set out with no other intention than that of showing their vigour of touch, and of producing an elegant picture. The result is a total want of likeness to the subject. Indeed, likeness to the subject is not a thing to which they attach any importance. From this craving to display vigour and to produce elegant pictures there results a neglect of details. Pictures are dashed off so sketchily that not only is there no likeness to the face of the person painted, but wise and noble men are represented with an expression of countenance befitting none but rustics of the lowest degree. This is worthy of the gravest censure. If the real features of a personage of antiquity are unknown, it should be the artist's endeavour to represent such a personage in a manner appropriate to his rank or virtues. The man of great rank should be represented as having a dignified air, so that he may appear to have been really great. The virtuous man, again, should be painted so as to look really virtuous. But far from conforming to this principle, the artists of modern times, occupied as they are with nothing but the desire of displaying their vigour of touch, represent the noble and virtuous alike as if they had been rustics or idiots.

The same ever-present desire for mere technical display makes our artists turn beautiful women's faces into ugly ones. It will perhaps be alleged that a too elegant representation of mere beauty of feature may result in a less valuable work of art; but when it does so the fault must lie with the artist. His business is to paint the beautiful face, and at the same time not to produce a picture artistically inferior. In any case, fear for his own reputation as an artist is a wretched excuse for turning a beautiful face into an ugly one. On the contrary, a beautiful woman should be painted as beautiful as possible; for ugliness repels the beholder. At the same time it often happens in such pictures as those which are sold in the Yedo shops, that the strained effort to make the faces beautiful ends in excessive ugliness and vulgarity, to say nothing of artistic degradation.

Our warlike paintings (that is, representations of fierce warriors fighting) have nothing human about the countenances. The immense round eyes, the angry nose, the great mouth, remind one of demons. Now, will any one assert that this unnatural, demoniacal fashion is the proper way to give an idea of the very fiercest warrior's look? No! The warrior's fierceness should indeed be depicted, but he should at the same time be recognized as a simple human being. It is doubtless to such portraits of warriors that a Chinese author alludes, when, speaking of Japanese paintings, he says that the figures in them are like those of the anthropophagous demons of Buddhist lore As his countrymen do not ever actually meet living Japanese, such of them as read his book will receive the impression that all our countrymen resemble demons in appearance. For though the Japanese, through constant reading of Chinese books, are well acquainted with Chinese matters,—the Chinese, who never read our literature, are completely ignorant on our score, and there can be little doubt that the few stray allusions to us that do occur are implicitly believed in. This belief of foreigners in our portraits as an actual representation of our people will have the effect of making them imagine—when they see our great men painted like rustics and our beautiful women like frights—that the Japanese men are really contemptible in appearance and all the Japanese women hideous. Neither is it foreigners alone who will be thus misled. Our own very countrymen will not be able to resist the impression that the portraits they see of the unknown heroes of antiquity do really represent those heroes' faces.

OPENING TO "GLIMPSES OF DREAMLANDS."

[This extract from the preface to one of Bakin's famous novels, published 1809-10, is part of a translation by Ludovic Murdwin, who characterizes Bakin as a rationalist of the most modern Teutonic type; and his grim satire and good-tempered cynicism remind us alternately of Carlyle and Thackeray.]

The length of man's life is fifty years, and even in ancient times men rarely reached seventy. A merely limited life is received from Heaven-and-Earth by man, but his passions have no limit. He is bound like a slave to the cent which he wears his nails to the very quick to obtain. Before the six-monthly term days arrives, payments and receipts are being briskly carried on, pleadings for grace or money, and loud lamentations; men borrowing with the meek, downcast look of a stone saint, yet rushing off to evil deeds with it whenever they grasp the desired treasure, and then repaying their loan with visage scowling like the King of Hell when he has his mouth smeared with red incense.

The popular proverb that "even in hell sins are estimated in money" is, alas! esteemed a golden saying. "My property," and "this or the other man's," although receiving the titles of their owners, remain but a little time like a passing traveller who tarries for a night; for if there is income there is also expenditure. Eating and drinking, after all, are the pegs which give strength and continuity to life; and when you are really hungry perhaps nothing tastes nasty. Barbarous foreigners buy the first bonitos of the season with a golden koban, and when they have devoured them still crave for more. If you try to fare on plain rice flavoured only with tea, it will travel but about three inches down your throat, and soon all will find its way to the public boats. A tight little house that you can get your knees into is quite large enough. The grand palace of the Chinese Emperor Shikō and a straw hovel differ only in being spacious or narrow, and in being placed in the country or in the capital. If you have but a room which a single mat covers, and in which you can just manage to stretch your legs, your body will be completely protected. So, again, when you have packed your five feet of carcass into clothes, they form a convenient temporary skin to your frame, while finest brocade or the [illegible] suffer only in being brilliant or dirty. When men die and become mere clay, no one by looking at their flayed [unclothed] bodies only can tell which of them wore the grandest raiment during life. A waist-cloth made of silk crape is after all only a waist-cloth. When the true principles which ought to regulate these things have been apprehended, our shoulders and knees will no doubt be covered with such patches of all sorts and hues as may first come to hand; but when one knowing of any costly article for which he has no special purpose, strikes a bargain on the condition of two six-monthly payments, adorns himself with a borrowed wadded gown, and points his toes to the pawn-shop, it is really a most pitiful state of affairs!

According to the kind of costume they wear, men are divided into great and mean; and it follows simply the laws of etiquette in regard to the cut and colour of his clothes, putting on even tattered pants and carrying a rusty sword in his girdle, though his possessions may be slender, still he can pay his debts. Performing all the duties assigned to him by Heaven, seizing the opportunity which a little leisure affords to turn over the green covers of an old book, viewing the ways and manners of the ancients, and resolving henceforth to mend his own ways, this is better far than purchasing pain with money. The Religion of Heaven does not give superabundantly. If a man has money he may have no children to bestow it upon; if his family is large his means may be small; handsome men are often fools, ugly men clever; taking sorts of fellows are frequently lascivious, and men poor in speech are strong in will.

CLOSING SCENE FROM THE "CHIUSHINGURA."

[This story, "Chiushingura," records the celebrated fidelity of the "Forty-seven Ronin," the great heroes of feudal Japan, 1701-2. Translation by F. Victor Dickins. It embodies the dearest ideals of a large part of the Japanese people. In dramatic form it is repeatedly rendered in Japanese theatres. Mr. Dickins's translation follows the modified text of a famous dramatist, Takeda Izumo, who shares with Chikamatsu a wide popularity.]

Another moment, and the body of Moronao lay on the floor, covered with wounds.

The conspirators crowded round it, wild with excitement, shouting:—

"Oh, rare sight! Oh, happy fortune! Happy are we as the moki when he found his waif,‡ fortunate as though we gazed upon the flower of the udonge, that blossoms but once in three thousand years."

But to you—to you, fell the glory of finding him, and it was you who dragged him here alive, into our presence. 'Twas a good deed, Yazama, acceptable to the spirit of our master; each of us would fain have been the doer of it. Comrades, say I not well?"

Yoshida assented on behalf of the rest.

"Delay not, Yazama," resumed Yuranosuke, for time flies fast."

"If it must be so," cried Yazama, as he passed forward uttering *gomen in a low tone, and offered incense first of the company.

"And next our chief," exclaimed Yoshida.

"What man can that be?" asked Yoshida wonderingly, while his comrades echoed his words.

The Karō, without replying, drew a purse made of striped stuff from his bosom. "He who shall precede me," cried the Karō, "is Hayano Kampei. A negligence of his duty as a vassal prevented him from being received into our number; but, eager to take at least a part in the erection of a monument to his liege lord, he sold away his wife, and thus became able to furnish his share toward the expense. As his father-in-law had the money, and was murdered, and I caused the subscription to be returned to him, mad with despair he committed seppuku and died—a most miserable and piteous death. All my life I shall never cease to regret having caused the money to be returned to him; never for a moment will be absent from my memory that through my fault he came to so piteous an end. During this night's struggle the purse has been among us, borne by Heiyemon. Let the latter pass forward, and in the name of his sister's dead husband, burn incense before the tablet of our lord."

Heiyemon, thus addressed, passed forward, exclaiming, "From amidst the shadows of the tall grass blades the soul of Kampei thanks you for the unlooked-for favour you confer upon him." Laying the purse upon the censor, he added:—

"'Tis Hayano Kampei who, second in turn, offers incense before the tablet of his liege lord."

The remainder followed, offering up in like manner—amid loud cries of grief, and with sobs and tears, and trembling in the anguish of their minds—incense before the tablet of their master.

Cutting off their enemy's head with the dagger with which their dead master had committed seppuku,* they resumed their orgy, exclaiming:—

"We deserted our wives, we abandoned our children, we left our aged folk uncared for, all to obtain this one head. How auspicious a day is this!"

They struck at the head in their frenzy, gnashed at it, shed tears over it; their grief and fury, poor wretches, beggared description.

Yuranosuke, drawing from his bosom the ihai† of his dead master, placed it reverently on a small stand at the upper end of the room; and then set the head of Moronao, cleansed from blood, on another opposite to it. He next took a perfume from within his helmet, and burnt it before the tablet of his lord, prostrating himself and withdrawing slowly, while he bowed his head reverently three times, and then again thrice three times.

"O thou soul of my liege lord, with awe doth thy vassal approach thy mighty presence, who art now like unto him that was born of the lotos flower,‡ to attain a glory and eminence beyond the understanding of men! Before the sacred tablet tremblingly set I the head of thine enemy, severed from his corpse by the sword thou deignedst to bestow upon thy servant in the hour of thy last agony. O thou that art now resting amid the shadows of the tall grass, look with favour on my offering." Bursting into tears, the Karō of Yenya thus adored the memory of his lord.

"And now, comrades," he resumed after a pause, "advance each of you, one after the other, and burn incense before the tablet of your master."

"We would all," cried Yoshida, "venture to ask our chief first among us to render that honour to our lord's memory."

"Nay," answered the Karō. "'tis not I who of right should be first. Yazama Jintaiō, to you of right falls that honour."

"Not so," cried Yazama: "I claim no such favour. Others might think I had no right to it, and troubles might thus arise."

"No one will think that," exclaimed Yuranosuke. "We have all freely ventured our lives in the struggle to seize Moronao."

Suddenly the air is filled with the din of the trampling of men, with the clatter of hoofs, and with the noise of war drums.

Yuranosuke does not change a feature.

"'Tis the retainers of Moronao who are coming down upon us: why should we fight with them?"

The Karō is about to give the signal to his comrades to accomplish the final act of their devotion, by committing seppuku in memory of their lord, when Momonoi Wakasanosuke appears upon the scene, disordered with the haste he had used, in his fear of being too late.

"Moroyasu, the young brother of Moronao, is already at the great gate," cries Momonoi. "If you commit seppuku at such a moment it will be said that you were driven to it by fear, and an infamous memory will attach to your deed. I counsel you to depart hence without delay, and betake yourselves to the burial place of your lord, the Temple of Kōmyo."

‡ Some drift-wood by which this sea-tortoise (moki) saw the light it had longed in vain to see for three thousand years.

"So shall it be," answered Yuranosuke after a pause. "We will do as you counsel us, and will accomplish our last hour before the tomb of our ill-fated lord. We would ask you, Sir Wakasanosuke, to prevent our enemies from following us."

Hardly had Yuranosuke concluded, when Yakushiji Jiūzayemon and Sagisaka Bannai suddenly rushed forth from their hiding-places, shouting.—"Oboshi, villain, thou shalt not escape!" and struck right and left at the Karō. Without a moment's delay Rikiya hastened to his father's assistance, and forced the wretches to turn their weapons against himself. The struggle did not last long. Avoiding a blow aimed at him by Yakushiji, Rikiya cut the fellow down, and left him writhing in mortal agony upon the ground. Bannai met with a similar fate. A frightful gash upon the leg brought him to his knee,—a pitiable spectacle enough,—and a few moments afterward the wretch breathed his last.

"A valiant deed, a valiant deed!"

Forever and ever shall the memory endure of these faithful clansmen; and in the earnest hope that the story of their loyalty—full bloom of the bamboo leaf §—may remain a bright example as long as the dynasty of our rulers shall last, has the foregoing tale of their heroism been writ down.

LITERATURE IN JAPAN.

We may take a glance, in passing, at the literature of Japan in general considered. As a whole, it has been for the greater part Chinese in language and script. As distinctly Japanese, this literature has had in fact only one period of dominance and high excellence—that lying between the eighth and the thirteenth centuries. The eighteenth-century literary revival was not a return to either the kana writing or to the native language of the classics; it was at the best an extension of the Chinese vocabulary, and the amalgamation of Chinese ideographs with the kana script in sentences that were Japanese in idiom and in construction. The Japanese literature of modern times has consequently been a composite of Chinese and Japanese words and writing. Chinese literature as affected by Japanese writers is at the present day rapidly decreasing in mass and in value.

Looked at as literature only, literature in Japan is exceedingly voluminous. It exists as extensive libraries of history, State records, and private historical digests; as regulations of court ceremonial; as codifications and commentaries upon civil and other law; as statements and expositions of doctrine and rituals for Shintō and Buddhism in religion, and of the ethics of Confucianism; as treatises upon Chinese philosophies; as biographies, records of travel, and works in fiction; as disquisitions on art; as general encyclopædias of topography, zoölogy, botany, and other departments of natural phenomena; as dramatic works; as records of folk-lore; and though last, by no means the least in mass, as poetry and comment upon the poems.

PRINTING IN JAPAN.

The art of printing, as block-printing, was brought to Japan as early as the eighth century. Printing from movable types was known at the end of the fourteenth century. In the seventeenth century the use of the press became general, and large quantities of the manuscripts hoarded for centuries reappeared as printed books, increasing in numbers until in recent times they have become one of the common possessions of the people throughout the empire.

II.

CONTENT AND VALUE OF JAPANESE LITERATURE.

Turning now from the history of Japanese literature, let us look for a moment at its content. How shall we characterize this? What is its value?

At the outset it must be acknowledged that in general the literature of Japan does not abound in matter of direct or living interest to Western readers. It had its springs in conditions and circumstances very different from those of the literature of the Occident. Its references to custom, to historic events, to personages and places of tradition, introduce the European and American reader into an environment almost wholly unfamiliar. Its motives for action, its praise and censure of conduct, are governed by standards which in many ways are unlike those dominant in the life of far-away peoples. Then its modes of expression have scarcely anything in common with the ways of speech to which the mind of the West has become habituated, and which the Western mind enjoys. In fact, the Occidental reader, generally speaking, has neither the requisite mental habit and intelligence, nor the peculiar mood, needed for an appreciative interest in the literature of the Japanese.

It would be injustice however to much that is of real value, to turn this judgment into a sweeping condemnation. Japanese literature is strange and alien; it is to the dweller in the West, as a rule, dull and unmeaning; its speech is painstakingly minute, dwelling upon details that in European speech are passed with hardly a touch,—the verboseness dragging its way through sentences that seem at times interminable. And then, in much that must be accepted as literature proper, as the belles lettres of the Japanese, there is a free display of thought and act forbidden in recent centuries by the moral standard of the approved literature of the West. But this literature holds the records of a peculiar and extensive mythology and folk-lore; it shows the origin and development of a unique system of government; it exhibits the elaboration of a social order of remarkable stability, and the operation of society under a system of ceremonial etiquette in the highest degree complex and refined. In this literature the ethnologist, the psychologist, the student of comparative religion, the art critic, the historian, and often the general reader, can find much pleasant entertainment and profitable study. There is in it, notwithstanding a mass of dull, prolix, and profitless matter, a considerable contribution to the world's means of diversion and stores of knowledge. The reader, it must be said, will look in vain into Japanese literature for intellectual creativeness or invention. The Japanese mind is characteristically neither original nor adventurous. In Japanese history, no philosophy or science has been started or been much advanced. From a remote past the people of this empire have been learners and followers of nations endowed as pioneers and discoverers. Their genius for the most part has lain in the appropriation and refinement of the gains first made by others. Accepting their monarchy as a direct descent of heavenly power into the lower world, the Japanese from ancient times have subordinated themselves to it under the sway of the twin chief virtues of the Confucian ethics, loyalty and filial piety. Under the influence of these principles a social order was developed, marked by a devotion to emperor, lord, parent, and to all superiors in the relations of man with man, that showed a self-abnegation such as has probably never been seen among any other people. Accompanying this universal social systematization was a ceremonial refinement, a graceful complexity of etiquette, developed with consummate excellence, and dominating even the humblest parts of the civil and domestic organism. As results of their social discipline, the Japanese as a people long ago accepted life as they were born to it, without disturbing impatience or restless ambition; they achieved great contentment with but small means for self-gratification; and they were prepared to yield life itself with a readiness almost unknown among self-assertive peoples. The learning of Japan—that is, the religion really directing the people, Buddhism; the principles and much of the detail of their law; whatever might be classed as science and philosophy — was received from abroad. Among the Japanese these things gained elaboration and in most of their relations received refinement with the lapse of the centuries. Hardly any of the industries, and we may say none of the fine arts, were originated by this people. The Japanese however have carried such interests, their arts especially, to degrees of excellence that have drawn to them universal admiration. Of all this and of much else, Japanese literature bears good record, and therefore has noteworthy interest and value to the peoples of remote lands.

JAPANESE POETRY.

In one department of letters, however, it may be said that the Japanese have wrought from a beginning, and have produced results that are specifically their own. Their poetry had its origin in a pre-historic age, and it has had a culture down to the present day distinctively individual and unique. Much Chinese poetry has been written in Japan, and by Japanese writers; but, unlike prose, Japanese verse has never been subjected to Chinese ways of thought and expression.

The cadence of Japanese poetry, Mr. Aston says, "is not marked by a regular succession of accented syllables, as in English." It has, says Prof. Chamberlain, neither "rhyme, assonance, alliteration, accentual stress, quantity, nor parallelism." These judgments are true, but with some qualifications. It is true that Japanese verse has normally an irregular cadence, yet much of it may easily receive, and often does receive, in the reading the movement of some of the simpler measures of English poetry. It is common, for example, to hear such verses as the following read as though they were composed in trochaic movement;—

Hated though you be,
Hate for hate do not return;
Hatred given accept,
If for hatred you give hate
Then to hating comes no end.

So, in the original of the I-ro-ha Buddhist hymn, given, above, the Nori no Hatsu-ne, "The Dominant Note of the Law," its lines generally take the rhythm of English anapestic verse as:—

Iiazura goto ni hi wo kasane;
Rokushiyu ruten no tane wo maki;
Hakanaku kono yo wo sugosū nari, &c.

In spending my days chasing things that are trifles;
In sowing the seed of the six-fold migration;
I pass through the world with my life-purpose baffled, &c.

However, the prosody dominant in Western poetry does not possess the poetry of Japan except, we may say, through the influence of a natural but unacknowledged rhythmic instinct. In large part, as Mr. Aston says, "it is only distinguished from prose by metre." In form, as noted before, Japanese poetry is peculiar is consisting generally of alternations of verses composed of five and seven syllables. "Lines of three, four, six and eight syllables," says Mr. Aston, "may be found in the oldest poetry,—but these variations are not intentional, and in singing or chanting the proper length of the lines is preserved." The standard model for compositions is the tanka, the five versed stanza of which quite a number of illustrative translations have already been given. Usually the tanka may be divided into two complete parts, the "first" or "upper" three lines, and the "second" or "lower" two. The reputed most ancient song treasured in Japanese tradition, the song of the god Susa-no-o, sung at the building of the bridal palace for a celestial pair, is the prototype of this popular measure. "When this Great Deity first built the palace of Suga," says the 'Kojiki' "clouds rose up thence. Then he made an august song. That song said:—

'Yakumo tatsu;
Izumo ya gaki;
Tsuma gomi ni
Ya gaki tsukuru;
Sono ya gaki wo!'"

This is, in somewhat free translation:—

"Many clouds appear:
Eightfold clouds a barrier raise
Round the wedded pair.
Manifold the clouds stand guard;
Oh that eightfold barrier-ward!"

Besides the tanka there are numerous variations in arrangement of the fundamental five and seven syllable verses, but the limits of this paper prevent their illustration. There are, however, two, extremes of composition that may be noticed in passing, the naga-uta, or "long-song," and the hokku or "first part." The naga-uta is indefinite in length. It is made up of couplets of the two kinds of syllables, the end of the poem being in an additional seven syllable verse. The legend of "Urashima Taro" given above is a good example of this kind of poetry. The hokku is a complete poem contained in only the seventeen syllables that make up the first three lines or "part" of the tanka. Necessarily it must be an exceedingly compact bit of word and thought skill to be worth anything—as literature.

The following hokku, which is also an acrostic of the word yutaka "fruitfulness," "abundance"—is a good illustration of its kind.

Yufudachi ya
Ta wo mi-meguri no
Kami naraba

If the summer shower
Would but round the rice-fields go
As it were a god!

In the construction of Japanese verse there are certain special oddities, such as redundant expletives, and phrases called "Pillow-words" and "Introductions." These expressions are purely conventional ornaments or euphonisms. Much of the superior merit of this verse-writing depends also upon a serious use of puns and of other word-plays. The "Pillow-words," says Prof. Chamberlain, are "as a rule, simply epithets that were formerly applied quite naturally and appropriately to various objects, places and actions, but which in most cases, by the process of phonetic decay, by being used in connection with expressions having but a very distant affinity to the expressions they originally served to define," &c., "have become almost unrecognizable and practically devoid of meaning." "They are prefixed to other words merely for the sake of euphony. Almost every word of note has some "Pillow-word.'" An "Introduction" is shown in the third song above, taken from the Hyaku-nin-isshu. Speaking of these and the other word plays special to Japanese serious poetry, Prof. Chamberlain remarks: "There is nothing in the nature of things constraining us to associate plays upon words with the ridiculous. Each literature must be a law unto itself."

The subject matter of the poetry of the Japanese, to characterize it generally, is simple and serene emotion in reference to person or nature. And,—still broadly characterizing it,—its quality is daintiness; its mood is meditation. Poetic imagination, as known in the West, has no place in Japanese verse; instead, the verse is given over to lyric fancies. It is conventional, suggestive, impressionist, like Japanese painting. It is not a chosen means for sounding and recording the depths of profound spiritual experience. It has never been the vehicle of an epic.

Leaving now this sketch of our subject, we are constrained to say in general judgment upon Japanese literature, so far as it has been disclosed, that it can not be given place among the great achievements of the human intellect. However, this fact is not to be wondered at. The limitations that have prevented its expansion into a larger and more commanding worth have almost of necessity surrounded it. The people of this empire—from time immemorial isolated in the farthest East; dependent for their letters, laws, philosophy, religious faith, ethics, science, industrial and fine arts, upon their neighbours of the continent; also hitherto denied by nature the creative or inventive genius—as a matter of course have been unable to go far or to rise to any great height in literary achievement. What they may hereafter do, no one can foretell. To-day they are living in an environment unlike any they have before known. Japan is now in intimate intercourse with the whole world. The Japanese people are now appropriating with marvellous speed the civilization of Europe and America. What may be called a world-consciousness and culture is becoming dominant among them. To what heights they may reach, actuated by this power; to what grand goal they may yet move, the future only can show.

THE IMPERIAL DIET.

FRIDAY, DEC. 23RD.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10, 15 a.m.

PETITIONS.

A report was presented by the Petitions Committee, showing that 185 petitions had been received since the beginning of the session, of which 40 had been discussed, and of these 38 were recommended for adoption and presentation to the Government and 2 were rejected.

THE LAND TAX.

The Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for Reassessing the Taxable Value of Land was then read.

Count Matsukata, Minister of State for Finance, in a very brief speech recommended the Bill to the favourable consideration of the House. He explained that the correlated measure for increasing the Land Tax had been greatly changed by the House of Representatives, but, in view of all the circumstances, the Government had given its consent to the changes. The two Bills were inseparably connected, and he trusted that they would secure the consent of the House.

Mr. Nishimura Riyokichi condemned the proposed system of reassessment as not really calculated to give fair results, and asked for some explanations, which were furnished by the Government Delegate.

The Bill was handed to a special committee of 27 chosen by the President.

The Bill for increasing the Land Tax having been briefly introduced by Count Matsukata, Viscount Soga inquired what course the Government contemplated for making good the deficiency of estimated revenue that would result from the changes effected in the Bill by the House of Representatives.

Count Matsukata replied that the matter was now under consideration, and that the necessary measures would be submitted in due time.

Viscount Soga inquired whether the Treasury would not be inconvenienced by losing a revenue of 3½ million yen at the end of 5 years, as would be the case if the new Land Tax Bill became law.

Count Matsukata did not anticipate inconvenience. The country's resources were constantly developing, and the state might look forward to largely increased revenues at the end of 5 years not only from the Customs dues but also from indirect taxes in general.

Viscount Soga found it difficult to trust any forecast of the kind. He recalled the fact that in 1873 the Government had issued a notification promising to gradually augment the indirect taxes and reduce the Land Tax proportionately until it stood at 1 per cent. It had not been found possible to fulfil that promise, and there was no apparent reason to suppose that the Government's anticipations would prove better founded on the present occasion. He desired to hear the views of the Finance Minister upon that point.

Count Matsukata considered that the conditions existing now differed so materially from those existing in 1873 as to forbid any comparison of the kind instituted by Viscount Soga. He (Count Matsukata) had been one of those concerned in drawing up the financial programme of 1873, and he could therefore explain the facts fully. When the financiers of that time spoke of taxes upon commodities being gradually substituted for the Land Tax, their idea had been to impose taxes upon the produce of the land, as rice, barley, and so on. To that course he had objected, his view being that the Land Tax was the simplest and surest form of revenue. But his objections had been over-ruled, and the notification had been issued indicating an ultimate transfer of the burden of taxation from the land itself to the products of the land, a policy which proved impracticable in the end. As to the future, it was of course impossible to speak with certainty about the conditions which would exist 5 years hence, but certainly to draw deductions about 1904 from the experiences of 1873 in a country where such changes had taken place and were still taking place, seemed unwarrantable.

In answer to further questions, His Excellency explained that the Government's opinion had been strongly in favour of raising the Land Tax from 2.5 per cent. to 4; but, failing an increase in that amount, there could be no doubt as to the advisability of consenting to the smaller figure voted by the House of Representatives. With regard to the apprehension that this additional burden would swallow up the resources available for educational purposes among the agricultural classes, he believed that the people had an ample margin of financial ability, and that no fear of the kind need be entertained.

Viscount Tani presumed that before imposing such a heavy tax upon the farmers, the Government had taken care to obtain accurate information as to the pecuniary condition of the people in the agricultural districts. It was altogether a superficial view to imagine that the land-holders were well off. In outward appearance they might show some signs of affluence, but there was a reverse to the picture. Had that reverse been examined? Did the Government know what the farmers' debts aggregated? He had no desire to press for an immediate answer, but hoped to receive an accurate reply after full investigations had been made. (At the conclusion of these remarks the Viscount left the Chamber excitedly, without awaiting the answer which the Government Delegate had risen to give)

The Bill was handed to the same Special Committee of 27.

PETITIONS.

Twenty-seven petitions were then brought forward en bloc by the Petitions Committee and adopted by the House for presentation to the Government.

URGENT NEW BILLS.

The President asked the House, as a matter of urgency, to consider six Bills just sent up by the Representatives with reference to the Sake Tax.

The Bills were handed to a Special Committee and the House rose at 3.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.15 p.m.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. Kuribara Riyoichi, on behalf of the Budget Committee, reported that the Committee, had adopted the Government's General Budget of Expenditures and Revenue for 1899-1900, with slight amendments, which he now presented for the House's consideration. He entered into minute explanations of the various appropriations and the proposed amendments, and, on the conclusion of his speech, Mr. Hoshi Toru proposed that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and proceed to deliberate with closed doors, in order to receive Ministerial declarations.

Dr. Hatoyama opposed the project of a secret session, but the House voted against him, and the doors were closed at 1.50 p.m.

The secret session lasted two hours, during which time the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs made a statement of the Government's foreign policy.

The House rose at 3.55 p.m.

SATURDAY, DEC 24TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.15 a.m., and at once proceeded to consider the four Supplementary Budgets for the current fiscal year.

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGETS

Viscount Yuri, on behalf of the Budget Committee, having reported favourably on all these Budgets, they were passed, after a few unimportant questions.

FOREIGN JOURNALISTS IN JAPAN.

Count Yoshii, on behalf of the Special Committee, reported that the Committee had approved the Bill for amending the Press Law in the sense of removing the restriction by which Japanese subjects alone being eligible to become publishers, editors, or printers of newspapers or periodicals. The Committee recommended, however, that the word "actually" should be expunged in the clause "actually residing in Japan," for if the word were allowed to stand it might have the effect of obliging a foreigner to cease his journalistic enterprise during a temporary absence from Japan.

The Bill was passed without debate, as was also the Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for removing the tax upon ships in Okinawa Prefecture.

A PATRIOTIC REPRESENTATION.

Viscount Tani introduced a Representation urging that a suitable measure of State aid should be given for the restoration and conservation of the national shrine of Miyagi and the prefectural shrine of Sano in the same prefecture. The Viscount alluded to the fact that Japan alone among the States of the world could boast absolute immunity from foreign invasion ever since the founding of the empire, and an unbroken line of Sovereigns from the first ruler Jimmu Tenno to the present day. He spoke of the historical fact that Jimmu, a scion of the Gods, had worshipped his ancestors before setting out on his campaigns, and said it was a matter of national regret that the birth place of Japan's first Emperor could not be located with greater accuracy than the province of Hiuga. These shrines, however, had witnessed the Emperor's acts of reverence to his divine ancestors, and it was the country's duty to keep them in proper repair. Owing, however, to their out-of-the-way situation they were little visited by pilgrims, and unless something was done for them speedily they would fall into a hopeless condition. The Representation suggested that, on the occasion of the approaching Jimmu festival in April of next year, a "hall of reminiscence" (Chōkō kwan) should be erected and the limits of the sacred park extended, and that a suitable sum should be granted for the purpose.

The House voted the Representation without debate.

REVENUE MEASURES.

The four Bills (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Sake Tax, interdicting the brewing of Sake for Domestic Use, &c., were then passed, as was also the Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Law relating to Infractions of the Indirect National Tax Regulations.

The House rose at 11.15 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House of Representatives met at 1.15 p.m.

PETITIONS

Mr. Yamamoto, on behalf of the Petitions Committee, reported that 52 petitions had been received, of which 11 were recommended for the House's consideration; 17 were set aside, and 24 were handed to the Government for purposes of comparison.

NEW SOURCES OF REVENUE.

Favourable reports of Special Committees were presented with regard to the Bill for amending the Income Tax Law, the Bill for increasing the note-issuing power of the Bank of Japan and taxing it, and the Bill for amending the Statutory Tariff in the sense of imposing higher import duties on Chinese sake, alcohol, and tobacco. The Committee recommended, however, that instead of the Government's plan of taxing the Bank of Japan's net profits, the impost should take the form of 1 per cent. of its note issues. Mr. Inouye Kakugoro moved that the Committee's figure should be amended to 1½ per cent., and the House adopted his proposal. The other Bills were all passed as amended by the Committees, the amendments being insignificant.

THE BUDGET.

The House then proceeded to discuss the Budget of Revenue and Expenditures for 1899-1900.

Mr. Takaoka objected to the action of the House on the ground of precipitancy. He considered it impossible to discuss such a subject as the Budget intelligently in the short space remaining at the House's disposal before the New Year's recess.

Mr. Ishiwara thought that both the Budget itself and the Committee's report were unintelligible. He moved that they be withdrawn for future presentation; and he supported his motion in a speech of great length which elicited many marks of impatience from the House.

Both of these motions were rejected, and the House proceeded to debate the Budget item by item.

Mr. Taguchi Ukichi moved that the allowance for a consulate in Spain be struck out of the Foreign Office's appropriations, and the motion was passed, although Viscount Aoki spoke in opposition to it.

Mr. Tanaka Shozo asked a question about the Expenses for Shrines in the Home Department's section, but before he could receive an answer Mr. Tsunematsu moved that the Committee's amendments of this Department's appropriations be at once passed, whereupon Mr. Tanaka became highly excited, and protested with such vehemence and intemperance that cries for his expulsion from the Chamber were raised in several quarters.

When the Finance Department's section came up for discussion, Mr. Tanaka Shōzo demanded why no appropriation appeared on account of sums spent in bribing members.

Mr. Shimada Saburo moved that the expenditures on account of the Army be reconsidered by the Government. He had always advocated full discussion of the expenditures, and their reduction to the lowest possible figure before the question of revenue or increased taxation was considered, but the taxation bills had been carried with a rush. Nevertheless the amendments made by the special committee in the Land Tax Bill had created a deficiency of revenue to the extent of 7 millions of yen, and they had now to determine how that deficit should be made good. He believed that retrenchments aggregating 2 million yen could be made in the expenditures of the Foreign Office and the other Departments, but even then there would still be 5 millions to find. On what source of revenue were they to rely? Since the Diet had adopted the programme of armaments expansion after the war, dissolution of the House had succeeded dissolution, and change of Cabinet had succeeded change, solely because of the difficulty of dealing with the finances. The fact was that the framers of the armaments expansion programme had fallen into the error of imagining that war would follow immediately on the footsteps of war. The well-known English statesman, Sir Charles Dilke, whose knowledge of foreign affairs was profound, had said, with reference to Japan when her army consisted of 7 Divisions only, that she was a great military Power and that England should seek an alliance with her. It was therefore a mistake to allege, as some alleged, that if Japan wanted to be regarded an an eligible ally she must increase her army. The great thing was to have a thoroughly well trained and efficient force rather than a large one. The House should observe that not only was the number of Divisions increased, but also the peace footing of the battalion was raised from 800 to 1,000 men. Formerly, too, it had been the custom to pay for the army's weapons by means of the money saved on account of soldiers allowed to leave the colours before their time, in consideration of special proficiency, but that system had now been abandoned, thus creating additional expenditure. He also condemned the plan pursued with regard to Formosa as needlessly costly and not calculated to give the best results. He did not profess to be familiar with the details of administrative business, but he held it to be the duty of the Ministers of the Crown to spare no effort for bringing the finances into a sound condition. Ever since the Restoration the Army's part in that great event had invested it with such prestige that for its sake the Navy was neglected, and now, in consequence of the War with China, a factitious value seemed to be again given to the military service. He wished it to understood that he was not opposing the Government, but rather sought to assist it in the vitally important task of bringing the finances into order.

Viscount Katsura, Minister of State for War, reminded the House that the programme of expansion, which now came before it in the regular course of events, had been approved by the Diet in its 9th session, and endorsed by succeeding Diets. These expenditures which they were now asked to vote were absolutely essential. Ever since he received the portfolio of War he had devoted himself assiduously to introducing order into military affairs, and he had succeeded in effecting economies which enabled him to establish a Division in Hokkaido without making any additional demand on the Treasury. With regard to Formosa, no measures of expansion were contemplated. The programme did not extend beyond completing the system of fortifications commenced by the Chinese. No pains had been spared to cut down the expenditures wherever retrenchment was possible, and he trusted that the House would give its consent to the appropriations as they stood.

The Home rejected Mr. Shimada's amendment.

Mr. Taguchi moved, and the House passed the motion, that the appropriations on account of the Educational Investigation Society, the High Council of Agriculture and Commerce, and the High Council of Education be struck out, and that the grant in aid of the Physical Training Society be reduced from 15,000 yen to 10,000 yen.

Mr. Tanaka Shōzo moved that the whole of the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and Commerce be expunged, but no notice was taken of this proposal.

The whole Budget was finally passed as amended by the Committee.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. Hoshi Toru moved that the House rise for the New Year's recess, and that the session be resumed on January the 16th.

The President thought that business might be resumed on the 10th of January, but the House endorsed Mr. Hoshi's proposal and rose at 6.05 p.m.

TUESDAY, DEC. 27TH.

HOUSE OF PEERS.

The House of Peers met at 10.15 a.m.

THE LATE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AUDIT.

Viscount Tani explained that he had withdrawn a Petition to the Throne, presented by him but not yet brought up in the House, impeaching the conduct of the President of the Board of Audit. In answer to questions put in the previous session, the Government had acknowledged the impropriety of the President's conduct, but had pleaded the want of any law for dealing with such a case. Now, however, the official had resigned, and his successor had been appointed, so the matter might be allowed to rest.

REVENUE MEASURES.

The Bill (sent up from the Lower House) for amending the Income Tax Law was then read and handed to a Special Committee, after an ineffectual effort on the part of Baron Ozaki to have its consideration postponed until after the New Year's recess.

The Bills for taxing the Bank of Japan and increasing its note-issuing power were both handed to the same Committee. With reference to the former Bill, the Government Delegate explained that the amendment made by the Lower House, namely, the taxing of the Bank's note-issues instead of its profits, would apparently reduce the amount of the tax. On the other hand, the tax on profits would not be leviable unless the Bank was prosperous, whereas the tax on note-issues would have to be paid under any circumstances. The Government preferred the tax on profits.

On the motion of Marquis Kuroda the House agreed to debate the Land Tax Bill and the Re-assessment Bill together.

The report of the Special Committee on these Bills showed that the majority of the Committee strongly disapproved of the amendments made by the Lower House in the Land Tax Bill, but agreed to vote for them in consideration of the peculiar circumstances of the time.

Viscount Tani spoke at great length against the Bills, and took occasion to attack Mr. Taguchi Ukichi, with whom he recently carried on an animated controversy. He said that Mr. Taguchi had taken up foreign theories about the Single Tax, and had misled ignorant folks.

Mr. Kaneko Kentaro replied, and was followed on the other side by Mr. Kamada, who attacked the House of Representatives vehemently for voting by unsigned ballot.

Mr. Miura called Mr. Kamada to order. He said that the House of Peers was not the proper place to find fault with the procedure of the House of Representatives, and he called on Mr. Kamada to withdraw his remark, or on the President to expunge it from the record.

Viscount Tani excitedly advised Mr. Kamada neither to notice Mr. Miura's criticisms not to withdraw his assertion, and the President ruled that he himself had no discretion in the matter.

A signed ballot was taken with regard to the Bills, when 155 voted for them and 55 against. The second and third readings were carried at once.

ADJOURNMENT.

A private Bill, providing that certain changes in the classification of lands might be effected by administrative order, was then passed, and the House rose at 5.20 p.m., to meet again on January 9th.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A WORTHY PHYSICIAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—In these days when we hear so much of the Doshisha matter, of unfaithfulness to trust and responsibility, of imperfect standards of ethics and morals, on the part of Japanese and see there are many who are quite ready to attribute the revealed qualities of the few to the whole race, it may not be unpleasant now as the time of goodwill to all—Christmas—draws near, to hear of a case of devotion to the highest ideals and self-sacrifice for those ideals, which the writer is happy to believe is not so much more rare in this country than in other lands: a case of self-immolation requiring grace such as the writer would feel wholly incapable of.

Though in no way connected with it, the writer has had occasion more than once to visit an institution in Meguro, one of the quiet suburbs of Tokyo, called the "Rest Garden for the Outcasts"—"I Hai En." The outcasts are lepers. A faithful physician and his wife give their lives to this work, in a tainted atmosphere, not in gloom or melancholy, but in cheerfulness and joy. Seldom have I heard a merrier or more gleeful laugh than comes from the lips of her who, with her husband, is living out her life in quiet, humble, secluded devotion.

They seem to me to represent a self immolation which very few even of those who count themselves exponents of high ideals would be willing to make, even if called upon to do so; surely less to originate and take up of their own freewill as this Japanese doctor, the head of this institution, and his wife have done. An outsider can scarcely comprehend the dreary, not to say disgusting, round of daily menial tasks, the attention to minutest details, the unfailing courage and perseverance hourly needed.

One may see lepers on the street begging; and they are allowed to live freely, and even to marry, all over Japan. But perhaps it is only human nature that when efforts are made to gather them into a home, to make them more comfortable and less of a menace to their fellowmen, they to whose neighbourhood they come should not be pleased, so that it requires the greatest wisdom and tact on the part of the local manager to secure the goodwill and, if may hap, sympathy of neighbours and local officials, as this man has done.

Of the many and varied self-set duties which this man and his faithful wife discharge he might not be pleased to have me speak; but this I am sure will not meet his eye.

The daily washing of putrifying sores with his own hands, attending to all the bodily needs of helpless patients whose hands have ceased to be useful, watching by the bedside of the dying who crave earthly sympathy and companionship as they go down to the river's brink with no relative or loved one near.

Attending to the careful sanitation of the whole place, which includes the scouring of basins and all utensils, of floors, the use of disinfectants, the careful sweeping of the garden, the very dust of which must be disinfected and carried away, so that well people may come; constant and daily housecleaning and washing and repairing of foul clothing, for helpers are few.

The simple matter of personal precautions, exchange of garments in going constantly back and forth from hospital to residence, and a thousand careful, thoughtful, necessary things that must become tedious beyond expression when done day in and day out, year in and year out, if not from motives of Heavenly love.

Fruits and garden produce which ripen in the tainted air may not be cultivated in the garden. Careful supervision is needed over all.

The physician and head is also an ordained minister, the spiritual needs of his beloved outcasts are dear to him, and many are they who have gone down into the dark valley in hope and peace and trust knowing that the Father's love was round about them, and underneath were the everlasting arms, for whom but for the ministrations of these saints all would have been dark.

There might be some compensation from a worldly point of view in such a work were it a large hospital, where many admiring comers and goers looked in and saw it all. But this is a quiet work in a corner with few who see or even know.

This man who has taken upon himself this work these many years, with few helpers, is not so strong and robust as he was when he began the task. The long almost daily walks which must be taken into the city where there is no means for jinrikisha hire, are especially wearing on him, and this past summer his health has well nigh broken, for there can be no summer or holiday vacation to those for whom no substitute could be found.

In these days of bicycles none could need one more than he—why not give him one? May not this work be remembered this Christmas time?

THE FANCY DRESS BALL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

DEAR SIR,—As Secretary of the above, I shall be glad if you will insert this letter in your next issue, in order to correct what I am told is a wide-spread misunderstanding as to the object of the Ball. It is to provide funds to meet the present urgent necessities of Christ Church; i.e. to pay for the Services now being held in connection with it: and has nothing whatever to do with the New Church Building Fund.

Thanking you in advance, I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

CATHERINE V. WILSON.

HABEAS CORPUS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL."

SIR,—A Japanese friend of mine was arrested in June of last year on a charge of fraud and forgery. The amount of money said to have been fraudulently obtained by him was about yen 200. In the following September bail was applied for but refused. In March of this year the preliminary examination (roshin) was concluded, and the prisoner was committed for trial. Bail was applied for in June and again in August, but both times refused. The trial (kōhan) began in November last, and resulted after some days postponement in a verdict of not guilty.

In other words, this unfortunate man was imprisoned for very nearly a year and a half before his case was decided; he was denied the privilege of being allowed out on bail for any portion of the time.

The man has a wife and five children dependent on him. He was earning a salary of yen 17 when arrested, and this was entirely forfeited after he had been in prison a few months. The family had to manage as best they could with the help of friends.

Now, sir, it is considered, and rightly so, one of the blessings of the Meiji era that torture of prisoners has been totally abolished. But in such a case as I have mentioned above, it is doubtful whether some prisoners would not prefer a briefer confinement with a little thumb-screwing to the prolonged suspense of a year or more in prison and the knowledge perhaps that in consequence wife and children were being reduced to direst straits for daily food.

I write in hopes that if public attention be more fully drawn to so serious a flaw in the administration of justice in this country, those in authority may be prevailed upon to provide a remedy.

I am, yours obediently,

ARMINE F. KING.

POSTAL DELIVERIES.

To the Editor of the "Japan Mail."

Sir,—I beg to bring to your notice the following alteration in delivery, which is necessitated by the sudden increase of mail matter during the first week of January.

From the 1st to the 7th January, 1899, the following four deliveries will take place in this city:—

1st	6 a.m.	3rd	2 p.m
2nd	10 a.m.	4th	6 p.m.

Yours faithfully,

K. YAGIU,
Director.

"STAR IN THE EAST" INSTALLATION.

The annual installation meeting of Lodge Star in the East, No. 640, S.C., was held on Tuesday evening (St. John's Day) at the Masonic Temple, Yokohama. The ceremony was conducted by Wor. Bro. Adam R. G. Clark, who ably installed Bro. E. C. Fox as R.W.M. The following officers were then invested.

J. G. Cleveland	I.P.M.
A. R. G. Clark	D.M.
H. Smith	S.M.
J. Tornoe	S.W.
C. Pope	J.W.
H. W. Lea	Treas.
J. T. Griffin	Sec.
John Diack	Arch.
A. G. Smith	S.D.
W. H. McGowan	J.D.
R. McCance	D. of C.
O. Keil	Org.
F. L. Elliott	I.G.
J. B. Coulson	Stew.
F. Bielfeld	Stew.
J. Delbourgo	Tyler.

Thirty-two of the Brethren afterwards sat down to dinner with the newly installed master and a pleasant evening enlivened by toast and song ensued.

DEATH OF THE REV. C. E. GARST.

We regret to chronicle the death of the Rev. Charles E. Garst. He had been sick only about a month; and was at first attacked with la grippe, and afterward with pleurisy, but finally strong symptoms of pneumonia set in. His wife and children were absent on a visit to her sister, Mrs. Dr. Macklin, in China; but they returned about a week ago to find him somewhat better. However, an operation was found necessary; but even after that he did not rally, and gradually failed. He retained consciousness till about an hour before death, which came at 2.25 on Wednesday morning. The end was quiet and peaceful, and the fact that he called often for his wife to sing "Faith is the victory" is sufficient evidence of the triumph of his faith. He has been a very earnest and devoted missionary, and has sacrificed his life in the prime of his years.

He was only 45 years of age, and first came to Japan 15 years ago. He was a graduate of West Point (U.S.A.) Military Academy, but abandoned regular army service to enter upon a missionary's life. He spoke Japanese excellently and was beloved by the Japanese people. He has also been well-known as an ardent advocate of the Single Tax. He leaves a wife and three children.—Communicated.

MR. BARRETT AT THE ORIENTAL SOCIETY.

The New Treaties: the Future of the Philippines; Siam; and the Open Door.

The Hon. John Barrett, late American Minister to Siam, delivered a most interesting and instructive address on subjects of much importance to Japan, on Sunday, the 25th, at the hall of the Imperial Educational Society, Tokyo, before a large audience composed of members and invited guests of the Oriental Society. The speaker, who is regarded as one of the best American authorities on Far Eastern questions, was four years in Siam, where he made an excellent record as a diplomat, conducting to a successful conclusion many important negotiations. His official reports, and contributions to Reviews on America's interests in Asia have attracted widespread attention. On leaving Siam in May he went to the Philippines and remained until about the first of November. Since then he has been travelling in China, including a visit to Peking, studying political and commercial conditions before returning to America. Although invited some time ago to address the Oriental Society, this was his first opportunity to accept. The last address before the Society was delivered by Earl Spencer, and the next is expected to be by Lord Charles Beresford. Mr. Barrett returns to Shanghai about January 4th to speak on the Philippines under the auspices of the General Chamber of Commerce. From there he returns to Washington via India and Europe. He has been asked to deliver addresses in both London and New York on the Eastern situation. Among the prominent members of the Society present to hear the distinguished speaker were H.H. Prince Tokugawa, Capt. Saito, Vice-Minister of the Navy, Mr. Watanabe, of the House of Peers, Mr. Satemi Chinda, Japanese Minister to Brazil, Mr. Manjiro Inagaki, Japanese Minister to Siam, and Hon. Secretary of the Society, Mr. O. Sasano, of the Foreign Office, Mr. Nakamura of the Home Office, Mr. Matsuura, and many other wellknown members.

In a few appropriate words Mr. Inagaki, former colleague of Mr. Barrett in Bangkok, introduced him to the audience. His remarks, which follow, were ably interpreted into Japanese by Mr. Midori Komatsu, Secretary and interpreter at the Foreign Office:—

Mr. President and Members of the Oriental Society:—When invited by this distinguished Japanese Society to deliver an address under its auspices, I had misgivings as to my ability to meet the standards of an organization whose membership includes so many of Japan's eminent statesmen and leaders of public opinion. I have, however, accepted the great honour conferred upon me by this invitation, not with the expectation of advancing ideas and expressing views which might be new to most of you, but with the simple hope of describing certain conditions and relating a few facts that have come under my particular observation in the Far East, and which may concern the welfare of Japan as well as of the United States and other great Powers whose future prosperity largely depends upon the developement of Pacific lands and the government thereof.

The privilege of addressing a similar gathering of my own countrymen would be great, but that of speaking before an audience exclusively Japanese and composed of men prominent in the successful conduct of the affairs of this remarkable empire will ever be remembered and appreciated by me as a unique experience and special honour. I thank you for assembling in such numbers and for extending so cordial a welcome.

Before taking up the main thread of my remarks, I wish by way of prelude to express to you my own personal feeling as an American towards you as Japanese and towards Japan, your country. In that way I may more readily awaken your interest and sympathy and not seem to be only a stranger and foreigner speaking from a foreign standpoint. Please consider me, although not of your race and blood, as one deeply concerned with you in the great problems of the Pacific, which are destined to affect Americans no less than Japanese. For Japan, for His Majesty your Emperor, for your statesmen and for your people I have that profound respect which is born of a close study of the wonderful rise and present progress of the Japanese empire. History does not record its parallel.

My own land has a record of growth and advancement material, political, and social that has invoked the admiration of the world, but if Japan forges ahead during the next two score years as she has during the past forty, America will be compelled to divide honours with her. Right here let me impress upon you that no other nation is watching more hopefully the progress of Japan than the United States. There is a spontaneous sympathy that wells up in the heart of America with Japan's magnificent ambition to rank, and hold her position, among the controlling Powers of the world. In the brotherhood of nations—or should I not say the sisterhood of nations, because we must class this beautiful land as "fair Japan,"—there will always exist indestructible ties of intimate relationship between the lusty youth of the Occident and the maturing maiden to the Orient.

Japan has been making history during the last decade that is written in indelible letters upon the scroll of time. Guided by an Emperor whose greatness and goodness is recognized in all lands, and by statesmen who seem to have been created for the special work in hand—like those great men led by the immortal Washington, who framed the fundamental laws of the United States and directed the nation's course though the most critical period of its existence—Japan stands to-day upon the threshold of immeasurable opportunities.

May she continue to be equal to the demands that will be made on her patience and good judgment is the prayer of all her well-wishers. The year 1899, may be the most important in Japan's history since the coming of Commodore Perry. The initiation in a few days of the new tariff law, followed in six months by the much graver step of the application of the new treaties which abrogate extraterritoriality and place your kingdom on an absolute equality of laws with other nations, will cause the statesmen, the students of international economics, and all persons interested in the evolution of a nation's political and social fabric, to watch and criticise, praise or condemn, honour or arraign you and your aspiring empire as never before.

In the continuous differentiation from simplicity to complexity there are difficult hazards to be encountered as well as favouring elements to encourage. Possibly Japan's most important step onward will be taken on July 17th, 1899, when she completely discards the swaddling clothes of political childhood, graduates, as it were, from the nursery of nations, and endeavours to carry with dignity the mantle of maturity. Speaking as an American, I have no fears for the success of the experiment. America and England showed their confidence in Japan when they led in the framing of new treaties. They now look forward to the confirmation of this confidence.

As a foreign representative of the United States, it has been my lot to study and exercise jurisdiction under extraterritorial treaties. While recognizing their inconsistencies, weaknesses, and anomalies, I have also noted their absolute necessity under certain conditions and in certain lands. Japan is about to demonstrate to the world that the necessity of such treaties no longer exists inside her borders. May I not, then, as an unprejudiced student of politics, and as anxious as if I were a Japanese for the success of the new system, express the hope that as a government and people you will practice a liberality of spirit towards foreigners and foreign interests in both the enacting and the administration of laws that will surely touch a responsive cloud of gratitude and appreciation throughout the world.

Such a spirit is, I am sure, already exerting its influence, as the passage of certain amendments to your codes proves. Japan has everything to gain and nothing to lose by such a policy. But I would not in this appeal to your judgement, belittle the necessity of reciprocal action on the part of foreigners and foreign interests. They also must play their part with fairness and good faith, but Japan can well afford in her strength and growth to even lead the foreign element within her confines in setting an example in generosity of legislation and catholicity of administration until it shall soon be heralded abroad that the new is better than the old!

It was not my intention in beginning this address to touch upon the question of treaties, but having come in contact recently with the foreign settlements of Yokohama, Kobe and Nagasaki, and been impressed with the marked interest in the subject, I have taken the liberty of referring to it solely with a desire to help on the good work of friendly cō̄peration of Japanese and foreigners in accomplish a successful and hence satisfactory administration of Japanese jurisdiction. Unless I am mistaken in my judgment of your statesmen whom I have met and questioned, Japan will faithfully strive to prove to the treaty powers that their confidance has not been misplaced.

Turning now to a direct consideration of the entrance of the United States into the field of Asiatic politics, we find a situation which must be of interest to Japanese as well as Americans. A few months ago it required some fifteen days steaming and the looking across 5,000 miles expanse of sea for Japanese to consider the United States as an actual neighbour. Now barely 300 miles, or one day's steaming, separates Japanese from American soil. From southern Formosa of Japan to northern Luzon of the Philippines is not a long call. From Yokohama to Manila direct is only 1,585 miles, or practically the same distance as to Hongkong.

The chief ports of Japan are nearer by several thousands of miles to those of the Philippines than the nearest port of the home county. San Francisco, by the way of Honolulu, is 7000 miles away from Manila, while from Hawaii to the Philippines is a stretch of 4700 miles. I would emphasize this neighbourly position of Japan's territory to the Philippines because it is a special bond of interest only noted by a careful study of the map. What this means for Japanese commerce can only be appreciated when the resources and opportunities as well as the location of the islands are discussed and understood.

The Philippines hold the same relative importance on the map of South Eastern Asia as Japan on the North. Whether they will ever occupy a position of like political importance, the future alone can tell. As Japan commands the approaches to Northern Asia so do the Philippines connect the southern approaches. Hongkong, Saigon, Bangkok, Singapore, and Batavia are all, as it were, within hailing distance of Manila. Hongkong is only 630 miles and two days steaming distance to thenorthwest. Singapore, is 1285 miles and 4 days, to the southwest.

The great stream of ocean commerce that pours through the Suez Canal and the straits of Malacca on its way to and from the Far East and Europe passes by the front door of the Philippines and will in the near future make Manila an important port of call not unlike Yokohama on the marine highway that leads, on the other hand, to and from America. From Manila to Port Darwin, in Northern Australia, is only 1,690 miles and steamers on the Australian route from the ports of China and Japan will soon find it to their advantage to stop en route at Manila.

Lying between 5° and 21° North latitude they reach right away to the North for a distance of 1,000 miles, or as far as from Nagasaki to Hakodate. From West to East they extend in longitude from 122° to 134°, or approximately 700 miles. Reliable estimates place the number of islands, large and small, in this wonderful archipelago at 1,500, but of these only about 25 figure conspicuously in the map or are usually visited in travel or commercial intercourse.

The total area is not definitely known. The Spanish government never made an accurate survey or, if it did, never published to the world a statement of area which could be accepted without question. Estimates run all the way from 50,000 to 150,000, but I am inclined to accept, after comparing the figures of the best authorities, the probable extent of the entire archipelago as approximately 115,000 square miles.

The principal island, Luzon, is itself 520 miles long and nearly 150 miles wide, northernin the and greater portem. The southern part is long and very narrow. If we take the section from Manila Bay north to Cape Engano we have a length of 260 miles and an average width of 125 miles, which equals an area of 32,500 square miles. It is a conservative estimate to place the area of all Luzon at 50,000 square miles.

Mindanao, the second largest island and the farthest to the south, covers at least 30,000 square miles. If these two comprise 80,000 the entire group must easily reach 115,000. I devote this much attention to the area because the question has been so much discussed and because correct idea of size are always important in grasping an accurate knowledge of land, especially where the county is so generally fertile and useful as in the Philippines.

Nature has certainly been prodigal in her provision for this archipelago. Speaking from my own observations and travels not only in the chief cities and along the winding coast line of the group, but in the interior, and comparing what I have seen there with what it has been my experience to observe in extended travels in other parts of the world, I am prepared to state and prove, if questioned, that a richer isolated land, or group of islands, viewed comparatively as to area and population, variety of agricultural, mineral, and forest resources undeveloped, as well as those already improved, cannot be found on this globe.

Quoting from an article on the subject which wrote for Harpers Weekly, I say:—"But it is not only I that say this. Every authority that I have consulted affirms this opinion or adds to its emphasis. There are not only gold and silver, but iron and coal; not only vast forests of ship and house-building woods, but rarest qualities for furnishing, finishing, and ornamenting; not only great areas given up to the cultivation of sugar, hemp, tobacco, rice, cocoanut, spices, and coffee, but wide reaches of virgin soil untouched and waiting the hand of the pioneer, supported by an honest government.

There are one or two railways, but there should be a score. There are a few lines of communication with the numberless islands, large and small, but there should be systems of launches and steamers by which everyone of these garden spots could be reached and developed. When I first visited the Philippines I was so impressed with the prodigality of nature that I made a list of resources that came under my observation.

Of woods there are cedar, sapan wood, iron-wood, bamboo, ebony, log-wood, palma brava gum, and a wonderful variety of ordinary hard and soft woods. Cultivated or growing wild are to be found hemp, sugar cane, tobacco, rice, coffee, bananas, ginger, vanilla, cassia, pepper, indigo, pine apples, cocoa, cacao, wheat, maize, ramie, cotton, as well as tamarind, mangoes, durians, oranges, guavas, limes, citrons, jack-fruit, custard apples, and all kinds of garden products. Of minerals, aside from gold and silver, iron and coal, already mentioned, there are copper, quicksilver, tin, antimony, saltpetre, sulphur. From the sea come coral, tortoiseshell, amber, and pearls. Beds of marble and deposits of gypsum are being worked to a small degree. Among the more useful animals are hardy ponies, indispensable water buffalos, swine, cattle, goats, and a few sheep, with a long list of wild fauna as varied as the flora which are windeed marvellous in both beauty and utility. Deer, wild boar, wild-duck, pheasants, snipe, pigeons, woodcock, afford sport all the year round.

The present foreign commerce of the Philippines can be placed approximately at 62,0 0,000 yen, about equally divided between exports and imports, except that the former generally exceeds the latter by a few millions. Indulge in no exaggeration when I declare that this commerce should expand to 100,000,000 yen within the next five years. The bulk of the exports is made up of hemp, tobacco, sugar, copra, sapan-wood, gum-mastic indigo, and mother-of-pearl, with a long list of lesser articles. The greater portion of the imports are manufactured products like cotton piece goods, yarns of all kinds, forged and cast iron, machinery, hardware, galvanized iron, cutlery, earthenware, glassware, as well as wines and liquors, canned goods, flour, and kerosene oil.

Both exports and imports are so capable of great extension in variety and value, that already since American occupation the list of articles exported and imported has shown a remarkable increase. A consideration of the articles which I have enumerated, together with the miscellaneous imports and exports which enter and leave all trading countries, will show to the commercial interest in Japan whether they have any concern in the trade of this valuable archipelago.

This leads up to the all important question; what will be the policy of the United States in the matter of duties or customs? Will these be differential in favour of the United States, or will they be the same for all nations including the United States? As this is a query which all commercial nations are waiting to have answered, it is not probable that it will be definitely decided until the pros and cons of both sides are fully discussed in the United States congress and in the public press, for until the American people have fully made up their mind to open or close the door of trade in all their new acquisitions.

The question cannot be now answered more than to say that no one in America, not even the President, yet knows what laws will permanently govern the administration of the Philippines and the customs. Sentiment in America is much divided on this point and from the home standpoint there are strong arguments in favour of either side. I think, however, that I am free to say that, owing to the present agitation over the open door policy in China, there is a strong feeling in favour of maintaining a "fair field and no favour" in the Philippines.

I will not, on the other hand, hide the fact that there is prospect of a high protective or discriminating tariff being applied as an experiment through the influence of the high protection element in one of our great political parties, but its opponents urge that it will prove a costly and hence not permanent experiment. The experience of the French in Saigon in comparison with that of England in Hongkong and Singapore will have an effect on our people when they study the issue.

The most convincing argument advanced by the advocates of the open door in the Philippines, aside from the question of comity of relations with other powers and consistency in defending the open door in China, is the fact that to-day all over China and the Far East, American products are meeting and successfully competing with European goods and hence require no special protection in the Philippines.

If I were candidly asked what I thought would be the ultimate policy of the United States in its Asiatic possessions, I would say that of fair trade for all, but I would not deny that from the standpoint of the protectionist there may be strong arguments for descrimination. The necessities of revenue will not permit free trade, as the term is used in America, any more than they do in Japan or the United States. At the present moments the Philippines tariff applies to all nations alike and will not in much probability be changed until the Government at Washington has determined what shall be the form of Government for the Islands—and that conclusion may not be reached for another twelve months.

From a knowledge of the views of United States senators and congressmen with whom I am in correspondence, I am able to say that the United States will not rush headling into any particular line of policy but will endeavour to enact laws that will be suited not only to the local conditions but to those which are unexpectedly developed by the entry of the United States into the arena of Asiatic international politics.

Returning again to the general features of the Philippines, we can placet he population at 8,000,000 for the entire Archipelago, of whom 5,000,000 reside in Luzon. In appearance, characteristics, and language they are not unlike the Malays and Siamese. While they have many of the indolent tendencies of all tropical peoples, they are more industrious than the majority of races living in the same latitude. Under guidance of good government and just laws they should be capable of making the islands as rich and attractive as Java or Burmah.

Although divided into tribes who speak different dialects, they resemble each other in the main points of physique and habits. The controlling branch are the Togalos, who are the prevailing people of Luzon. Next to them are the Visayas, who are the principal tribe of the southern islands. This leads me to speak of Aguinaldo, the present native leader, of whom you read so much. While I cannot espouse his cause nor sympathize with his efforts,—if he shall make them,—to resist American authority, I believe that he is deserving of far more credit and consideration than are usually given him. Perhaps the best appreciation of his ability and the strength of his organization can be attained by my stating that he is practically governing the entire island of Luzon outside of Manila and Cavite, where alone American jorisdiction prevails, that he is preserving law and order among the people, that he has a regular ministry, with its departments of foreign affairs, interior, war, finance, &c., a carefully organized congress of some 100 members, and an army of 30,000 men equipped with modern rifles and ammunition.

Brought back to Luzon by the consent of Admiral Dewey and cooperation of Consuls General Wildman and Pratt, and Consul Williams, he has gradually strengthened his position after co-operating with the American forces for the capture and expulsion of Spanish arms, until now he is a strong factor in the settlement of the future control of the islands. It is my belief that if he is approached with good judgment and diplomacy on the part of American officials, a conflict with him can be avoided, and peace and prosperity established forever among the natives under American jurisdiction. I have confidence that with such men as Admiral Dewey and Major-General Otis directing affairs the difficulties of the situation will be happily solved.

Manila, the capital and metropolis of the Philippines, is a city of 300,000 population, with its mediæval and modern sections like most other Asiatic cities. It is located in a beautiful bay much like Yokohama, and is a great and growing emporium of trade. The only other important towns where foreigners are located are Iloilo on the island of Panay, and Cebu in the island of Cebu, both to the south. The leading islands in resources and business after Luzon and Mindanao, are Panay, Cebu, Negros, Mindoro, Bohol, Leyte, Palawan, and Sulu.

In the limits of this address it is only possible to give a cursory glance at the Philippines and I have merely attempted to enumerate those salient features which will enable you to carry away an intelligent idea of new American territory in the Far East and your own near neighbour in the south which has heretofore been enveloped in such mystery. I will close my discussion of the Philippines by expressing the hope that they may be the means of more strongly binding the commercial and political ties of Japan and the United States. Is it not remarkable that while one great American naval officer, Commodore Perry, was instrumental in introducing new Japan to the world, another distinguished naval hero, Admiral Dewey, has taken the step which has opened the Philippines to the light of nineteenth century progress and civilization after being practically closed for four centuries? While the causes that led up to these two historical incidents are entirely different, may the results of the latter never cast any shadow or reflection on the former.

In concluding my remarks on the Philippines, I cannot do better than to turn to Siam, another land of growing importance in south-eastern Asia and one which to day is endeavouring to make commendable progress along the lines where Japan has set her so splendid an example. Siam should prove of special interest to all Japanese because of the recent successful negotiation of a treaty and the opening of closer diplomatic and commercial relations. Your own able representative and first Minister to Siam, Mr. Manjiro Inagaki, has already made exhaustive reports on the resources, characteristics and possibilities, of the kingdom, and hence I can do little more than emphasize the main points of interest. Without hesitation I can say that I believe Siam should afford Japan an extensive market for many of her manufactured products and that the exploitation of this tropical land by energetic and capable Japanese merchants would bring decided benefits to both countries.

Siam's foreign trade amounts to about 40 000,000 yen per annum, with exports slightly in excess of imports. Her chief exports are rice and teakwood, while her imports are not unlike those of the Philippines. With a population of 7,000,000, an area of over 200,000 square miles, made up of vast well-watered valleys and richly forested uplands, and a capital city, Bangkok, of 500,000 people, which is one of the busiest trade centres of Asia, Siam presents an interesting and resourceful field for development and investment.

After a residence of four years when I had abundant opportunity to study the country and people, my remembrances and impressions are such that I have only kind words for them and I trust that Japan's relations with Siam may be fraught with great good to both. Siam deserves encouragement at the hands of Japan in her efforts to improve her government and the conditions of her people and I trust that you will lend your strong influence to assist her where your own experience has told you what is wise and best in the evolution of an Asiatic Power from a secondary position to one of the first rank. Siam is blessed with an able ruler, and, if his counsels prevail, he will enjoy the prosperity and progress for which he aspires. Siam is too rich, her resources too manifold, and her location too important to be neglected by other powers. Unhampered by embarrassing political entanglements, I am confident that she would make a name for herself among the lesser nations of the world. May her powerful neighbours Japan, not be unmindful of the good that can be accomplished by closer relations with a land of such potentialities.

In concluding my address, to which you have given such kind and considerate attention, I take the opportunity to refer to the general situation of international politics in the Far East and the part which it seems to me such powers as Japan, Great Britain, and the United States should play. Rather than mince words or be guilty of not speaking the truth, I do not hesitate to say that in my humble opinion the outlook for the great commercial nations is not bright and that unless some united action is soon taken or some strong-handed policy followed, vast interests, both existent and prospective, will be irretrievably lost. I refer particularly to the situation in China and the necessity of maintaining equal rights of trade from Canton to Newchwang. My opinion is based not only on my own observations but on the reports and views of the leading merchants, consuls, and experts of the principal ports of China. The unanimity of opinion is so marked that there can be no doubt that it is well supported by actual conditions and plain facts. If anyone is skeptical he has only to travel and study the ground as I have done in order to be convinced. I entertain no unkind feelings against nations that are following the exclusive policy. They are doubtless acting for their best interests and cannot be blamed, but the powers already mentioned which have like and greater interests must not put off the day of action until it is too late. The rule of survival of the fittest applies to nations as well as to men. The test is at hand. Shall those Powers whose future integrity and greatness largely depend on similar influences not unite in an offensive as well as defensive policy of which the avowed object is the "open door?" In other words, shall we not act as well as talk? It seems to me that it is now or never.

The conclusion of the address was followed by hearty applause, which was repeated when Capt. Saito, Vice Minister of the Navy, on behalf of the Oriental Society, thanked the speaker for honouring them with so interesting a discussion of important issues.

On Monday night Mr. Barrett was entertained at dinner by Mr. Tsuzuki, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs. During the last few days he has had special interviews with Marshal Yamagata, Count Okuma, Viscount Aoki, Count Matsukata, and many other leading Japanese statesmen, who talked freely with him on questions affecting the United States and Japan in the Far East.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF JAPAN.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan was held at the Parish Buildings, No. 54, Tsukiji, on Wednesday, the 21st December, at 3 p.m., the Rev. D. C. Greene, D.D., being elected to the chair.

It was agreed that the minutes of the previous general meeting should be taken as read.

The CHAIRMAN having consulted the meeting on the point, it was decided that the reading of the Papers prepared for the occasion should precede the transaction of the regular business of the annual meeting.

INSTRUCTIONS OF A MITO PRINCE TO HIS RETAINERS.

The CHAIRMAN accordingly called upon Professor E. W. Clement to read his paper entitled "Instructions of a Mito Prince to his retainers," of which the following is a summary:—

Mitsukuni, the second Tokugawa Prince of Mito, was born in 1628, assumed the government of the clan in 1661, retired in 1690 and died in 1700. He was commonly known as Mito Komon, or Mito Chunagon, because he held office as one of the Advisory Council of the Shogun; in fact, he was considered a sort of Vice-Shogun; and after death he was honoured with the title Giko ("Righteous Prince"). In the government of his clan, he adopted "a wise and kind policy," and was highly esteemed by his contemporaries, especially for his learning and patriotism. He was himself a scholar and the patron of scholars, so that he has been aptly called the "Japanese Mæcenas." His literary labours, carried on with the assistance of Shu Shunsui, one of the Chinese scholars who fled to Japan from their native land on the overthrow of the Ming dynasty by the Tartars, were very extensive. Most famous of all, of course, is the Dai Nihon Shi, a standard work on the history of Japan. For further information concerning Mitsukuni and his work, I beg leave to refer to my papers on "The Tokugawa Princes of Mito," "The Mito Civil War," and "Chinese Refugees of the Seventeenth Century in Mito," in the Transaction of this Society.*

One of the smaller of his productions was a little pamphlet entitled "Giko Meitei" ("Giko's Instructions"), or, more fully, "The Instructions of Mitsukuni, Mitō Kōmon, to his Retainers." A copy of this was presented to me during my residence in Mito, and seemed to be worth reproducing in English. It is true, of course, that such instructions were commonly issued by the princes during the feudal period, and may, perhaps, be picked up without difficulty. But probably no better one can be obtained from any other source as merely a sample of such documents; and Mitsukuni's reputation as a prince and as a scholar seemed to be a guarantee that his instructions would be different from those of other princes. I take great pleasure, therefore, in submitting the following as the gist of his official instructions, probably given orally to his retainers, and afterwards published in pamphlet form:—

PREFACE.

The reason why I now propose to offer my humble opinion in detail as to what I think we must bear in mind is, that both you and I, together developing in righteousness and correcting evils, may not be ashamed to be compared with the honourable lords and retainers of ancient times, and may make ourselves well qualified to be referred to in the future, by way of illustration, as ideal lord and retainers. I ask you to appreciate my inmost heart and give me your opinions and counsel in all things and on all occasions. In ancient times sagacious princes invited the remonstrances of their retainers. How much more reason is there that I, who, without any merit, became prince through the accumulated virtues of my ancestors, be anxious morning and evening lest I should act contrary to your wishes and violate the principles which should govern the conduct of a prince. I beg, therefore, that you will kindly inform me without reserve of anything which is not right in my private conduct and in all matters pertaining to the administration of my province. Among such matters the government of the province is one which concerns the people, however trivial the question at issue may be. Therefore, as small matters even are of importance, I am bound to receive your instructions on the subject. You should not act in this matter with reserve. I fear, however, that you may be actuated by the feeling that what you say would offend me. And you may shrink from repeating your warning, because I have shown myself to be so unworthy as to become angry at a sharp remonstrance directed against my private misdemeanours. Should such a feeling ever arise on my part, it will be only momentary, for I affirm with bow and arrow† that my real desire is what I am now expressing to you. Therefore, as I have no wish to conceal anything from other persons, I implore you to remonstrate with me, without regard to my feelings, about anything, no matter what it may be, which you may see or hear or which others may tell you. Whether it be true or false does not matter. If it be, for instance, that I am too much inclined, even in a slight degree, to amusements or wilfulness; that I am too fond of women; that there is too much extravagance in my household; that I am haughty on account of my position or ability; that I do not heed advice; that I am unjust in the bestowal of rewards and punishments; that I keep worthy retainers at a distance and encourage flatterers; that I neglect learning and military preparations; that I have no sympathy with my retainers and the peasants; that I have a passion for useless articles; that I squander money; that I devote myself too much to building; that I forget what I owe to my position; these, and many other things which may occur to you, call for remonstrance. With reference to such things, you may place your views before me, when we meet, either orally or in writing. If it is a matter which should not be made public, you may send me a confidential letter, which, of course, no one else will be allowed to read or to delay in delivering to me.

Section I.—LEARNING.

Learning is nothing else than knowledge of the Way in which men should walk, and is necessary above all things. It should not be superficial or obtained from a merely selfish motive. It includes not merely reading, but also meditation and good behaviour; and in some cases it may be acquired simply by listening to well-informed friends. The works recommended for a course of study include "Shogaku;" "Shisho" ["Daigaku," "Chuyo," "Rongo" and "Mencius"]; "Kinshiroku" [a commentary by Shushi on Chinese philosophy]; and, if possible, "Gokyo" ("Five Classics"), including "Ekikyo" (a treatise on chances or changes), "Shokyo" (a treatise on moral and religious topics), Shikyo (a treatise on poetry), "Shunju" (an historical work), and "Raiki" (a treatise on etiquette), these, of course, are all works of Confucius and his disciples.

Section XV.—Military Equipments. Section XVI.—Buildings. Section XVII.—Philanthropy.

Section XVIII.—Duties of Samurai.

There are four classes,—Shi, No, Ko and Sho. Each has its own business. Those belonging to the No class are devoting themselves to agriculture; those of the Kō class are promoting industry; while those of the Shō class are engaged in trade. All of these three classes contribute something towards benefiting human society. What, then, is the use of the Shi class? Its only business is to preserve or maintain giri, ("right"). The people of the other classes deal with visible things, while the samurai deal with invisible, colourless, and unsubstantial things. Some may think, therefore, that the members of the Shi class are entirely unnecessary. But, if there were no samurai, right (giri) would disappear from human society, the sense of shame would be lost, and wrong and injustice would prevail. Therefore, samurai must be unselfish and manly and pursue a straight-forward course, regardless of their own interests. Story about Kogikyū, a Chinese official, who would allow no vegetables to be raised or clothes to be woven on his premises, because salaried samurai should not compete with the common people in pursuit of gain and deprive the latter of their means of livelihood; samurai should not be actuated by avarice or selfishness, but should always act in accordance with the principle of giri, as expounded by the ancient sages. "Now I have no further instruction to give."

Note A.—It was on the fourteenth day of the tenth month, in the third year of Genroku (1690), that Prince Mitsukuni became 63 years of age. On the following day he retired from active service and was honored by the Shogun with appointment to the position of Gon-Chunagon. With reference to this promotion he wrote the following poem:—

Kurai-yama
Noboru mo kurushi
Oi no mi wa;
Fumoto no sato ni
Sumi yokari keri.

"The ascent of the mount of rank is difficult for such an aged person; it is better to dwell in the village at the base." There is probably a pun in the expression "Kurai-yama," which may mean also "dark mount," and would then refer to the unforeseen future. Prince Mitsukuni was certainly not an ambitious man, and at that advanced age might well dread promotion to a responsible position at the court of the Shogun. Being a scholarly man, he much preferred retirement from active, public life in the quiet and beauty of Nishiyama, a few miles north from Mito. There he died in 1700.

Mr. Gubbins then read a short paper, intended to be supplementary to that read by Professor Clement, on the Laws of the Tokugawa period. In this he remarked that it was hardly necessary to call attention to the fact that the instructions given by Prince Mitsukuni to his retainers were part of a whole system of laws and regulations issued under the Tokugawa administration. These were of various kinds, were issued under many different titles, and covered a wide field, their range embracing administrative matters, ceremonial, etiquette, religion, family law, ethical teaching, and official duties, and including even precepts for guidance of the Throne and regulations for the Imperial Household. As a rule they concerned only the military class, and the titles under which they were issued varied with the source from which they emanated and the scope of their application. Some were issued directly by the governing Shogun, others by the Council of State, or some prominent statesman of the day, and some again were issued by local Daimios for the guidance of their retainers. To this last category the Prince of Mito's instructions seemed to belong. Quoting from a manual of the military class printed in 1838, the writer gave some particulars in regard to the issue of one set of Tokugawa laws,—the "General Laws for the Military Class," and a precis of these laws taken from the text published in the manual in question. In conclusion the writer observed that his paper touched only the fringe of the subject, which he hoped to be able to treat more fully on a future occasion. The little he had placed before the meeting was, however, perhaps sufficient to indicate how wide the subject was, and what large sources of information for those who sought to know more of Japan in her feudal days this class of literature contained.

The Chairman, on rising, thanked Professor Clement and Mr. Gubbins on behalf of the Society for their interesting and valuable papers which deserved an important place in its Transactions. He expressed his deep regret that the unavoidable absence of the honoured President of the Society deprived it for the time of the benefit of the full information upon the general subject embodied in these essays which was at his disposal,—a subject which deserved the careful attention of all who wished to prepare themselves to understand the institutions and life of modern Japan. Hence all students, whether members of the Society or not, would wait with much eagerness for the more comprehensive paper which Mr. Gubbins had kindly promised.

BUSINESS.

The regular business of the meeting was then proceeded with.

The Chairman called upon the Corresponding Secretary to read the following Report of the Council for the Session 1898:—

REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.

In spite of the paucity of meetings which characterized the early portion of the Session now drawing to a close, the Society was able to add to its Transactions by the publication of a Supplement to Volume XXIV., consisting of a valuable paper on the Flora of Formosa. Later on in the Session an increased activity became apparent in its proceedings, and although the record of the year's work shows only one lecture and two meetings at which papers were read, those papers alone will furnish sufficient materials for another volume in addition to Volume XXV., which is now in the press, and judging by the number and character of papers which have been promised, and are in course of preparation, there is every reason to expect that the ensuing session will compare favourably with many of its predecessors.

Seven new names have been added to the List of members during the session, two deaths of members have occurred, and there have been three resignations.

It will be seen from the Treasurer's Report, which, with the other usual appendixes, will be attached to the next Volume of the Transactions, that the finances of the Society are in a flourishing condition, the balance now standing to the Society's credit being yen 2,275 $\frac{44}{100}$.

The Council are glad to be able to announce the completion of the work of arranging the Library, which is now open for the benefit of members, and they take this opportunity to mention that several interesting books have been presented to the Library by the Authors.

This Report having been adopted, the Librarian explaining that his Report was included in it, the Treasurer read his Annual Report, which was accepted.

NEW OFFICERS.

The meeting then proceeded to the election of the officers for the coming year. The outgoing Council submitted the following list of names of officers to form the Council for the Session 1899, which was unanimously approved:—

President—Sir Ernest M. Satow.

Vice-President (Tokio)—The Rev. D. C. Greene, D.D.

Vice-President (Yokohama)—H. S. Wilkinson, Esq.

Corresponding Secretary and Recording Secretary (Tokio)—J. H. Gubbins, Esq.

Recording Secretary (Yokohama)—H. G. Parlett, Esq.

Treasurer—J. McD. Gardiner, Esq.

Librarian—E. W. Clement, Esq.

Councillors—B. H. Chamberlain, Esq., Dr. Divers, A. H. Lay, Esq., the Rev. A. Lloyd, Hon. J. MacCauley, Esq., W. B. Mason, Esq., Masujima, Esq., R. S. Miller, Esq., M. Revon, Esq., and the Rev. W. J. White.

The Chairman declared the meeting adjourned at 4.45 p.m.

THE CHINESE CLASSIC DRAMA.

(By a British Philistine.)

The Yokohama community misses a good deal by its want of curiosity in things Japanese and Chinese. There were only a few dozen people at the Public Hall on Friday evening to witness the performance of a Chinese play by the Suey Fong Min Troup, though such a performance in a European building is almost as rare an occurrence in Yokohama as it would be in London. Those who did not attend missed much. In the first place as a spectacle alone the play was well worth seeing.

The dresses were gorgeous in the extreme, and the acting was full of Chinese solemnity, which approaches pretty nearly to European farce. Then there was plenty of the raw material of humour in the performance, as seen by European eyes. Not that it was intended to be humorous; Heaven forbid that a great Chinese dramatist should descend to frivolity. "Matrimonial Jars, or, The Inconvenience of an Imperial Daughter-in-Law" is a grave and stately play written in classic Chinese by an Oriental Corneille, and celebrating an incident in the life of one Kwak-tze-i, who, as the Chinese "Who's who" would probably inform us, lived in the Tung dynasty quite a number of years ago.

The motive of the play is quite simple. The author is not concerned with neurotic heroines with three husbands and an episode or two behind them. He recks nothing of the woman with a past or the male sinner with a future. He does not deal in divorcées and women's rights ladies and psychological nonsense. They were not thought of in the time—happy, happy time—of the Tung dynasty. The whole plot of "Matrimonial Jars" turns on a point of etiquette. Kwak, it appears, does not—as his name would seem to apply—belong to the medical profession, but is a highly respectable military man, being no less a personage than the chief General in the Emperor's Army. There has been a great rebellion by someone somewhere—the geography is vague—and Kwak somehow—the means are also vague, for he would appear to be wildly ignorant of warfare—manages to defeat them and save his country. The Emperor, after duly boiling the ringleaders in oil, considers what honours he shall award Kwak, and finally decides to bestow the hand of his daughter on Kwak's son. Young Kwak has inherited apparently much of his father's courage, and accepts the lady. It wanted pluck, if she resembled at all closely her stage representative. For her Highness, as she came on the stage, was a figure to strike terror into the heart of any suitor. Twenty-thousand a year and a house in Park-lane would not tempt us if we had to accept Miss Royalty along with them. She wore a fearful and wonderful headdress of red flowers, beneath which her thin, rice-powdered, ghastly little face smiled wanly like a death's head trying to look jolly. She wore a lot of complicated silk upper garments and sashes, and a pair of loose unnameables, at the bottoms of which her tiny feet appeared, for all the world looking like the walnut shells that naughty boys sometimes fix on a cat's paws. She walked with a stiff gait; giving the suggestion that her legs were two rods of sealing wax, and might be expected to snap at any moment. When she frisked about the stage playfully it was positively painful.

Young Kwak, however, appeared rather pleased than otherwise with his bride, and we may be sure that he bragged about her pretty well at the Club, and lost no opportunity of referring to her as "my wife—she was the Princess Che-foo, you know, old boy." John Wang Smith, who had only married an Admiral's daughter, and Wei hai-wei, who had formed an alliance with a lady in the oil and chandlery line, were probably green with envy. But matters did not long run smoothly in the Kwak household. Old Kwak's birthday came round, and on it everybody in his family and visiting list was expected to call and Kotow to him—to render him reverence almost as a god. Kwak was a venerable-looking gentleman, with a long white beard of untwined rope—which he stroked from time to time, whether from pride or to assure himself that it was not coming off is not clear. He looked a thoroughly worthy old gentleman, and was probably respected and esteemed by all who knew him. Everybody was perfectly willing to Kotow to Kwak except his royal daughter-in law, and she flatly refused. "The idea of such a thing," said she in the choicest Mandarin language, "the idea! Me, a real live Princess, who have been educated regardless of expense, and taught French and extras and the globes, and used to such good society at poor dear Papa's, expected to go on my knees to that old fright. No, I won't, so there now!"

Young Kwak was very angry at this refusal. He regarded it as a slight on his family, and decided to exert his authority—which in China apparently is a euphemism for corporal punishment. The Princess receives a mild—a very mild—drubbing, just enough to make her what Americans call "mad," and not enough to subdue her. It is reported to the elder Kwak. He is now in a dilemma. On the one hand, as father-in-law, he is entitled to the homage of his son's wife; on the other, his son has laid violent hands on a Princess of the sacred Royal blood, which is something very like sacrilege. The old man sees his duty clear. With a sense of duty equal to that of half-a-dozen Brutuses he decides to sacrifice his son. The latter is arrested, and sent for trial before the Emperor. His Majesty, who appears to be in the habit of going circuit like an Assize Judge, comes down, in gorgeous robes, Imperial dignity, and a long black beard, and hears the case. His summing up is favourable to the prisoner. He decides that Kwak junior was wrong in striking his wife, because she is a Princess, and Princesses should be exempt from matrimonial arguments of that kind. But his wife was also wrong in not making obeisance to Kwak senior, for by the law and custom of China a daughter-in-law must do reverence to her father-in law, and, though she were fifty times a Princess, her duty towards him is none the less certain. So he decides that on the whole honours are easy, and releases young Kwak. The last scenes are the effecting of a reconciliation between Kwak and the haughty Princess, in which the bye play was very amusing, the lady at last relenting, and going gaily off the stage on Kwak's arm.

After that there was a little Chinese fencing, and two generals in most gorgeous uniforms made various splendid poses on the stage. They both carried great peacock feathers in their headgear, and had a couple of signalling flags fastened to each shoulder in lieu of epaulettes, for it appears that Generals were in the habit of going about under a heavy press of canvas in those days. It must have been awkward for them in a typhoon.

There were also some novel acrobatic feats, which were cleverly performed, though with a certain clumsiness of foot. The orchestra was a rather barbarous one. One squeaking string instrument ran through the whole score, diversified by the banging of a gong, a tatoo of chopsticks on lumps of wood, and the clashing of some very brassy cymbals. The Princess sang a song which threatened to stretch out to the crack of doom, accompanying herself on a species of string instrument which she struck deftly with a pair of long thin ivory rods. The instrument afforded about three—possibly four—notes, and there was just a suspicion of monotony about the performance.

CHINESE NEWS.

The Sultan and Sultana of Perdang are visiting Shanghai.

H.M.S. Phœnix, says the N.-C. Daily News, has just received the new explosive (Lyddite), the chemical that caused such havoc at Omdurman, smashing the Kalifa's palace and the tomb of the Mahdi.

Lord Charles Beresford intends to leave Hongkong on the 5th prox. in the Coptic for Yokohama, and after a short stay in Japan will proceed in the new steamer America Maru to San Francisco via Honolulu.

The Universal Gazette, of Shanghai, states that the Russian Governor of Port Arthur recently issued a proclamation inviting Chinese to settle in the vicinity of Port Arthur and Talienwan. Houses are promised rent free to all who come, and such as have no trade or business can have permanent employment as labourers at one and a-half Newchwang "tiaos" of cash per diem, or 240 cash. Those who come, however, must bring their families with them. According to other native accounts, the harsh methods adopted by the Russians, when they first seized Port Arthur, literally drove nine-tenths of the native population from the region, and the consequent sparsity of inhabitants now has probably been the incentive for this proclamation, especially as the Russians imply that they have plenty of unoccupied houses on hand.

The Universal Gazette received, on December 18th, the following telegram from Hangchow:—"At about 8 o'clock last night (17th) some portion of the Government powder factory in the Lower City here caught fire resulting in frightful loss of life and property; no less than some 1,500 persons are said to be killed and several hundreds of houses destroyed by the explosion of hundreds of barrels of newly-made gunpowder. The Upper and Middle Cities are, however, untouched." A second telegram, dated the 19th inst., is as follows:—"I now learn that the explosion caused great destruction to houses situated within a radius of three or four li of the scene. Several hundred houses were either set on fire or blown down but fortunately the loss of life was comparatively small, my yesterday's estimate of some 1,500 lives lost being according to the reports in circulation at the time."

A Nanking dispatch, as translated by the N. C Daily News, reports the death, on the night of the 15th instant, in that city, of H. E. Fêng Shen, Tartar General of Kiangning. H. E. Liu Kun-yi, Viceroy at Nanking, will therefore be also Tartar-General ad interim pending the appointment from Peking of a new Manchu official. The deceased officer was formerly Assistant Military Governor of the Tartar City of Hangchow.

Prince Ching recently held a combined review of the troops of General Tung Fu-hsiang's Kansu Corps, and the Peking Field Force, aggregating exactly 60,000 fighting men. Every soldier and trooper was armed with a breach-loader and there was not the slightest indication of an antiquated musket or bow and arrow in the whole region—the Southern Hunting Park.

General Sung Ch'ing Commandant of the Wuyi Army Corps of 30,000 men, left North Kinchou on the 19th instant for Shanghai kuan with the bulk of his forces. This last-named post has been chosen by the Empress Dowager to be General Sung Ch'ing's headquarters in her grand scheme to surround Peking with a quarter of a million of foreign-equipped troops to oppose invasion from Manchuria or the Gulf.

Western journals, says the Shanghai Mercury, have recently been filled with marvellous tales regarding a Chinese slave girl who many years ago, in time of famine, was sold by her parents to a Manchu lord and who showed such precocity that she became a great favourite in the household, was given a good education and afterwards presented to H.I.M. Hien fung, in whose harem she rapidly rose from a subordinate position to that of a secondary wife and, on becoming the mother of his only son, was made an Empress, and then became the Empress-Dowager, who for nearly forty years has been the real ruler of China. It is a very romantic story but unfortunately for the relaters the slave-girl portion of it is wholly fictitious. There is no place perhaps where myths grow more readily than in China and it is a weakness of the Chinese people to desire to represent their own race as having in some way outwitted their Manchu rulers and put a Chinese upon the throne. There used to be a story in circulation with regard to the Emperor Hienfung that he was a Chinese child smuggled into the palace. As for the Empress-Dowager she is the daughter of one of the most prominent families among the Manchu nobles, and was chosen by H.M. Hienfung as a secondary wife. On the birth of his only son, Tungchi, the happy mother was hoodwinked with the title of "Empress," but the Empress who was distinguished by the appellation of "the Eastern Empress" from the location of her palace, while the mother of the heir to the throne was called the "Western Empress." Both women after the death of Hienfung united to rescue the young prince from the hands of the cabal which was planning to obtain control of the Government, and fleeing from Jeh-ho to Peking, they obtained the assistance of Prince Kung, the brother of Hienfung, who was able at once to secure the arrest and execution of the traitors. These three persons then formed themselves into a regency and managed all the affairs of the empire during the minority of Tungchi and continued their regency through the minority of his successor the present Emperor Kuanghsu.

The Echo de Chine has received a telegram from Amoy reporting the total loss off Dodd Island of the American ship Berlin, which left New York on the 24th of July last for Amoy with a cargo of kerosene oil. Nothing was known as to the crew.

To a telegram from Viceroy Chang Chih-tung to Viceroy Liu of Nanking, the other day, asking the reason of the latter's recent war preparations, the following reply, says the N.-C. Daily News, was received by Viceroy Chang:—"The Ningpo cemetery riots have up to now not yet been settled. The French having without cause slain or wounded several tens of Chinese during riots are still unreasonable and refuse to grant compensation to their families. On the contrary, they (the French) are still determined upon removing the cemetery and demanding an extension of their Settlement. On account of them also Tsai Taotai has been removed from office. The French are unreasonable and unjust in the extreme. Hence I am determined not to give way to them. Rather ten thousand times war than that. Although the Throne may ask me to give way I am determined to oppose the French demands."

The report and statement of accounts of the Hongkong branch of the Navy League show that the number of members and associates since the beginning of the year has risen from 93 members and 20 associates on 3rd December, 1897 to 268 members and 50 associates. There is also a balance of $661.64 in hand.

It is reported that through the Russo-Chinese Bank there has been ordered in Scotland two of the most powerful steam excavators, for employment in deepening the harbours of Ta lien-wan and Port Arthur.

Hu Yü-fên, Director General of Northern Railways, who has made his headquarters at Tientsin, started on the 13th instant for a prolonged tour of inspection of the route of the proposed railway extension to Newchwang. H.E. will also visit North Kinchou, to which city a branch line is to be made, and from that city will journey towards Newchwang. H.E. Hu expects to be absent from Tientsin for a month at the least.

The Hongkong Daily Press hears that the Chinese at Canton, both mandarins and populace, are well satisfied with the verdict and sentence in the Toulmin case, but consider it a hardship that the friends of the murdered man should have been called upon to pay the costs of the trial.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A most important experiment is to be tried this winter, according to recent London advices. That is the effort to keep the Baltic Sea open to trade by means of a gigantic ice-breaker which has just been launched in England. The vessel, which has been built for the Russian Government, is provided with a forward propeller, which is calculated to vastly assist in the crushing process by disturbing the water under the ice and depriving it of support. The stern of the ice-breaker is cut into a recess, into which the stern of another vessel can be securely lashed, and thus attain the utmost protection from her powerful consort. Besides convoying the merchant ship, the ice-breaker is capable of herself carrying a heavy cargo. It is confidently expected that, through her agency, the principal trade routes which depend on Baltic ports will be kept open in winter, and thus provide continuous employment to an enormous section of the community.

A salvage party under the direction of Mr. Moulsdale, the Manager of the Tanjong Pagar Dock Co., left Singapore on December 10, for Labuan in the Company's tug-boat Mercury, with pumps and other necessary gear, to render assistance to the steamer Abana, which has been wrecked near Labuan while on a voyage to Port Arthur, laden with coal.

The P. & O. steamer Brindisi, one of the two steamers with which the unfortunate Yayeyama Maru collided in Moji harbour, is considerably damaged, having been cut down from the hawse-pipe on the starboard bow close to the stem of the vessel below the water. The damage below the water-line is not yet known. In addition to this, the vessel has lost two anchors, with 75 fathoms of chain, and also two boats on the starboard side. At Moji, to enable the Brindisi to reach Nagasaki, she was filled up forward of the collision bulk-head with layers of sleepers and concrete. The vessel will go into the local dock for repairs, which, it is thought, will take several weeks to execute.—N. Press

The formidable volume of London street traffic was strikingly illustrated in an address delivered Sir John Wolfe Barry before the Society of Arts. He estimated that sixty millions had been spent on the construction and extension of railways within the Metropolitan area since 1858, and put the daily influx and efflux by railway alone between the suburbs and Central London at nine hundred and fifty thousand persons. To gain some notion of the amount of street traffic in urban London he had had observations made, and found that the number of vehicles and passengers passing a given spot in four thoroughfares at a busy hour were as follows:—Cheapside: vehicles, 992; pedestrians, 6,358. The Strand: vehicles, 1,228; pedestrians, 5,660. Piccadilly: vehicles, 1,497; pedestrians, 3,910. Tottenham Court Road: vehicles, 661; pedestrians, 5,586. The police worked marvels in controlling the traffic, but it was becoming daily more and more unmanageable. To remedy the difficulty he contended that wide arterial improvements in the streets themselves were likely to be far more effective than additional railways, overground or underground. The latter only tended to add to the congestion of the streets. A scheme of new main thoroughfares of adequate width for present and future traffic should be laid down, and this be realised as time would permit.

Commercial life, remarks Bradstreets, appears to be proving more and more attractive to college men, if statistics recently gathered by a Yale professor are to be taken as fairly representative. The statistics are derived from the records of the academic department at Yale, but they refer to the vocations of about 7,500 graduates, and perhaps it is only fair to regard them in a general way as typical. The figures show but little change in the proportion of graduates following the law during the century, that profession in each scholastic generation enlisting about a third of the graduates. At the beginning of the century the ministry, which in the earliest days of Yale attracted a larger proportion of the graduates, followed the law as a close second. The proportion attracted by the law has in the interval suffered little change, but the ministry is not chosen by nearly so many graduates as formerly, and its former place seems now to be taken by the mercantile vocation, which enlists about one-third of the graduates at present. This vocation, indeed, seems to be growing more attractive to university-bred men under modern conditions, and it may be that in the near future it will attract even a larger proportion than at present.

H.B.M.'S COURT FOR JAPAN.

Before H. A. C. Bonar, Esq., Consul and Assistant Judge.

FRIDAY, December 23rd.

THE FIRE ON THE "TROOP."

The hearing of the charge against Emil Gorig, boatswain of the British ship Troop, of setting fire to the ship, was continued.

Paul Meihs, seaman, identified the knife produced as his. He heard that it was in the boatswain's possession and asked him for it. He said he had lent it to the mate. This was after the fire.

Lewis Henry Abel, an American citizen, in the employ of the Standard Oil Company, to which the Troop was consigned, said it would be impossible to pick out the two damaged tins of kerosene which had been referred to in the evidence. A number of damaged tins had been landed and some had gone out of the godown. He produced two sample tins of oil, one full and one empty. In order to get at the oil a screw cap at the top might be unscrewed and the tin pierced from there.

By prisoner: Witness could not say whether the stopper could be wrenched off by anyone in the dark. It was soldered on to the tin, and if the solder were melted the hole left would be smaller than if it were cut round.

The Master, recalled, said the two tins of kerosene which had been referred to had been landed, and therefore could not be produced. Witness could not identify them if produced. Witness described how the Customs House officer sealed the ways of access to the hold at night and specified the means by which access could be obtained to the hold. Witness did not know the requisite conditions for spontaneous combustion. Witness described the experiment of sending the man Maier down the air shaft. Maier was the largest man on the ship.

By prisoner—The two tins referred to as standing on sails where the seat of the fire was, had the screw tops taken off them, but they were not cut out. He could not say whether they had been taken off by a knife, or melted off by fire.

In answer to the Court witness described the means taken to secure the knife belonging to Meihs from the mate.

Emil Maier, sail maker, was called, and repeated his evidence given at the enquiry. When he saw the sails after the fire he noticed a strong smell of kerosene. He could think of no accident by which the sails could have taken fire. The sails were quite dry when he was working on them a day and a half before the fire.

William Blanchard, second mate, was recalled, and asked a few additional questions by the Court.

The Court then adjourned.

On resuming William Dunstan, steward, gave evidence as to the sealing of the means of access to the 'tween decks by the Customs House officers.

Henry Nelson Gilbert, the black cook of the Troop, repeated his evidence.

John James Efford, marine surveyor, said he was called to survey the damage done by the fire. He went on board on the 14th, and afterwards the next day. He found on the starboard side that the spar ceiling was burnt away to the extent of eight to ten feet. A large area of paint was also scorched. Witness's opinion when he first saw the damage was that the fire was the work of an incendiary. The fire on the port side had burnt and charred the deck planking to a greater extent than on the other side. There were two quite distinct fires. The cargo was very much damaged by fire and water.

Nils Hansen, a boy on the Troop, also gave evidence.

By accused—Witness had said he had had a light down below the day before the fire, but he could not remember if the mate had told him he must not say anything about it.

Accused—Are you afraid to tell the truth because you will get kicked on board?

Mr. Bonar—I can't allow you to put questions like that.

Mr. Lowder—Were you there with a light the day before the fire?

Witness—Yes.

Who was with you?—The mate. It was the lamp usually used, and witness had carried it there before. Witness did not remember the mate telling him to keep it secret that a light had been taken down below.

By the Court—He slept in the same cabin with the accused; but heard no noise during the night.

Peter Legsdin, able seaman, said the day before the fire he was engaged in stowing planks down below. He was not smoking.

William Scott, recalled, said he remembered the customs officer sealing a door leading to the between decks the evening before the fire. Witness did not know whether or not the seal was moved the next morning.

James Matthews, able seaman, said he acted as watchman on the night before the fire. He described his discovery of the fire, and said just after he saw accused coming from the lavatory.

By accused—Witness probably saw two or three men on deck during the night, but he could not say who they were.

By the Court—It was a very windy night, and witness would not hear anyone at a little distance.

The mate, recalled, denied that he told the boy Hansen that he was to keep it a secret that they went down below with a light the day before the fire. He said nothing at the time, but after the fire he told him people would be accusing them of setting fire to the ship if it became known. It was so dark in that part where they had to go that a lantern was necessary.

This completed the case for the prosecution.

After being cautioned the prisoner said—I wish to state that I have had nothing to do with setting fire to that ship either accidentally or maliciously. I think it is put up to bring somebody into a scrape, and I am pitched on, and that some of the witnesses would have a better memory and speak freer if they were clear of the ship than now they have to go a voyage on her. I think fear prevents many from answering the questions in a straightforward manner.

Prisoner was committed for trial.

JAPANESE CHESS.

In the "Westminster Papers," as far back as 1875, we find the following interesting article from the pen of a valued Chess friend, Mr. W. B. Mason, of Tokyo, who was then a resident of Nagasaki:—

JAPANESE CHESS.

It never was my good fortune to find in any Chess library to which I have had access, any reference to the game as it is played in Japan. Chess historians traverse ancient Babylon, India, and China in their vain endeavours to discover the spot that gave it birth, and though I do not desire to assert that Japan may be entitled to the honour, there are a few remarkable facts on the subject worthy of elucidation. The following diagram represent the game of Shogi, or Chess, as played in this country. As the pieces have no definite shape, beyond some being larger than others, and principally distinguished by the written characters upon them, I am necessarily obliged to append the names only of the various Shogi-Koma, or Chessmen, in their respective squares.

Yari	Kei-ma	Gin	Kin	Ou	Kin	Gin	Kei-ma	Yari
	Hisha						Kaku
Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu
Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu	Fu
	Kaku						Hisha
Yari	Kei-ma	Gin	Kin	Ou	Kin	Gin	Kei-ma	Yari

It will be first observed, from the above diagram, that the board consists of 81 squares, or 17 more than that used in the European game. The movements of the piece are as follow:—

Yari, or spear, moves downward to the end of the file on which it stands, when, however, it reaches the square of the opposing Fu, or Pawn, it can become a Kin. Its movements are similar to those of the Rook, on the single file.

Keima or Uma, a horse, is identical with the Knight, but it only moves forward. It can also become a Kin.

Gin, or silver, moves one square diagonally at a time, also one square forward. If removed from its original position, it can retreat one square diagonally only, and when it takes possession of the ground of an opposing Fu, it has the option of becoming a Kin.

The movements of Kin, or gold, are somewhat like those of Gin. It has, however, the power of moving one square on each side of itself, but cannot return diagonally.

Ou, or King, is in all respects similar to our King, and the object of the game is, of course, "Otezume ni suru," or to checkmate him.

On the second line we have two pieces; Hisha, a chariot, whose movements are the same as those of a Rook; and Kaku, a corner or angle, which moves diagonally, like our Bishops.

Fu, a Pawn or foot-soldier, moves one square forward at a time, and, after attaining the square of the opposing Fu, it may likewise claim the rank of a Kin. The operation of capturing a piece by a Fu is not done diagonally, as in our game, and as so many pieces are liable to reach a higher grade, the transaction is simply made by turning them over, the new title being written on the reverse side. There are other minor ramifications of the movements, which it is unnecessary to detail.

It will thus be seen that a wonderful likeness exists between the two varieties of the one game. The Japanese system is undoubtedly more elaborate than ours, but whether it admits of greater scientific combinations I am unable, at present, to determine. The game is regarded by the Japanese as a game of mimic warfare, and it is played by all classes; holding much the same position as Draughts do in great Britain. On the other hand, the game of Go, or Japanese Draughts, is considered much more difficult, and is patronised almost exclusively by the upper classes. In fact, with our game of Checkers, there is little comparison, there being 361 goishi, or round pieces, employed in playing the Japanese game. But the origin of Japanese Chess is an interesting questions for investigation. From where and by whom was it introduced into a country excluded from all intercourse with the outer world till within the past few years?

That it has been an established recreation in Japan for centuries there can be no doubt, but one point is worthy of special notice. The absence of a Queen, or a piece endowed with a like power, is a conspicuous feature in the Japanese game. So important is this that, at the first glance, one would imagine to attempt to prove an analogy between the European and Japanese games without it would be as effectual as the Darwinian theory minus the "missing link." But, in my opinion, that is not so. It is now upwards of a thousand years since the Salic law existed in this country, and a Queen not having held the reins of Empire for that period, the name has almost become a nonentity. And it is just possible that this fact might have had at one time so far modified the aspect of the game. Certainly, the universality of chess seems to favour the idea that, like that of Language, its origin must be traced to one common source.
